Although certain illness-related expenses may be covered by provincial and/or private health plans, these programs do not cover many medical costs.

This insurance plan – which covers 22 critical illnesses, including cancer, Parkinson's disease and multiple sclerosis – entitles the person to a payout if he or she survives at least 30 days after a doctor's confirmed diagnosis.

If a claim is not made for 10 to 15 years, the premiums will be fully refunded. If a person doesn't survive the 30 days, his or her family would be refunded.

This relatively new form of insurance was launched in South Africa in the early 1980s by a heart transplant surgeon who became alarmed after witnessing patients struggling to afford medical treatment.

The plan was adopted by Canada in the mid-1990s and has steadily gained popularity, although the majority of Canadians are unfamiliar with it.

Certified financial planner Mark Halpern likens the product to RRSP contributions.

"I tell people that if they're maximizing their RRSP at $15,500, [why not] take another $15,500 as a personal health account for $1 million, which you'll get paid if you get sick," Halpern says.

"If nothing happens to you, you get your money back," he says.

Halpern emphasizes the product is different from Long Term Disability (LTD) in several ways.

"With LTD, you have to have insurable income and then they'll pay you two-thirds of your income," he says, adding that a person does not need to be employed to qualify for the insurance product, nor does his or her income have any bearing on qualifying.

"I sell the product to wealthy people… as they can't qualify for LTD," he says.

Halpern encourages people to consider investing in a policy sooner rather than later, as rates are poised to go up and the rules are likely to change.

"There's a window of opportunity right now," Halpern says.

"Five years from now, the product will be without a guaranteed premium and the [fully refunded] premium will be gone."

Purchasers of the insurance must take a medical exam to qualify and can pay for the policy in a lump sum or in instalments.

Israeli firm produces multifocal contact lens

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If you're middle aged or older, chances are the newspaper print you're reading right now doesn't appear nearly as sharp as it did years ago.

Likewise, many of a certain age will swear the instructions on medicine bottles have been getting smaller over the years and are now barely readable.

To make matters worse, the correction offered by contact lenses doesn't seem to solve the problem. True, obtaining a new prescription and switching to bifocal or multifocal glasses is always an option, but do you really want to give up your contacts?

Luckily, high-tech manufacturers have provided contact lens alternatives for today's consumer.

One of them currently being marketed in Canada is a lens produced by Soflex, a privately held Israeli company that has introduced a product that provides the same vision benefits that multifocal glasses do. While there are a number of competitors offering similar lenses, one Toronto optometrist is finding excellent results when he prescribes the Israeli lens.

Dr. Kerry Salsberg said he has been fitting Soflex's Eni-Eye Multi Lens for more than four months and so far the results have been excellent.

"I've had phenomenal success with the comfort of the lens and the ability to see both at a distance and near," he said. "This is a great lens."

Leis Vision, the Canadian distributor of the Soflex lenses, promotes the Eni-Eye Multi as allowing "the lens wearer to clearly see at distance vision as well as being able to do normal intermediate distance tasks, such as working with a computer, or close activities such as reading. Clinically, it has proven to be a very successful product."

A one-year supply – six to 12 pairs of the disposable lenses – can cost $330 to $400, depending on how quickly they must be replaced, Salsberg said.

A second lens offered by Soflex, the Eni-Eye Soft K, is geared primarily for patients who suffer from Keratoconus, a degenerative disease that alters the shape of the cornea, and for those with other conditions that cause irregular corneas.

Patients who suffer from this condition have found that hard contact lenses provide better vision correction than eyeglasses, but hard lenses can only be worn for a relatively short period of time.

The Soft K lens is comfortable, provides excellent correction for long periods of time and is specifically designed to address this condition, Salsberg said.

An Israeli study of 36 patients with irregular astigmatism (where the curvature of the cornea and lens surfaces are more round in one direction than the other) showed that 81 per cent of patients who stopped wearing other contact lenses because of discomfort found that the Soft K lenses provided better visual acuity than glasses.

The same study also found the lens provided better or the same visual sharpness in 58 per cent of the eyes that had previously worn other contact lenses.

Uno Leis, president of Leis Vision, said he has been carrying the Soflex lens for less than a year and it is popular among practitioners. "We're very excited by the potential," he said. "The population that needs a bifocal-type of lens is growing."

Many people, who have grown used to contact lenses, are hesitant about switching to glasses as their need for multifocal focus increases. The Eni-Eye lens addresses this consumer concern nicely, Leis said.

For those who suffer from keratoconus, a condition he likened to having a pimple on the cornea, the Soft K is very comfortable and works well for a large range of patients.

Leis said he first learned about the Israeli-manufactured lenses about five or six years ago when he was researching the company on the Internet. Even then he came across material urging a boycott of the Israeli manufacturer. Leis refused to be influenced by that plea and he has found no resistance from practitioners against using Israeli products.

"It's clearly identified as Israeli and no one has turned it down," he said.

The lenses are also marketed in Europe and the United States and distributors have had no difficulty in obtaining the lenses. Turnaround for the product is quick and few are returned for technical reasons. Leis said he plans to increase his line of Soflex products.

Founded in 1979, Soflex is located in the western Galilee in the Bar-Lev Industrial Park. Soflex is the major supplier to the contact lens market in Israel and exports to 25 countries across Europe, South America, and the Middle East.

New psoriasis treatment sets sufferers free

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Living with psoriasis has made Nina Malik feel like a prisoner in her own skin.

"It's hindered my life a lot," said Malik, who has lived with the condition for 30 years. "I have always been conscious of people looking at me."

Because of the disease that causes itchy, red patches, and in her case, covered 60 to 70 per cent of her body, Malik has avoided social functions and has even missed work.

But now, a new breakthrough treatment has offered Malik, and others who suffer from psoriasis, the hope of leading a normal life.

The treatment is called Amevive and it works by reducing a psoriasis sufferer's overactive T-cells, which are thought to play a major role in the cause of the condition.

The treatment consists of injections that are administered once a week for 12 weeks. While some patients respond well after one 12-week course, many patients require a second 12-week course before they experience a significant change.

The injections can be self-administered by the patient. Biogen Idec, the company that developed Amevive, offers patients training to ensure proper administration of the drug.

Although psoriasis is often thought of as a skin condition, it is actually an autoimmune disease in which skin cells multiply 10 times faster than the normal rate. This results in raised, red scales on the skin called plaques that are not only unattractive, but are also itchy and sometimes painful.

Psoriasis can also reduce a sufferer's quality of life.

For Malik, psoriasis meant never wearing shorts or T-shirts and never feeling comfortable with the way she looked.

She was diagnosed with the condition when she was six years old, after she had chicken pox.

According to Malik, the disease usually stems from some sort of trauma to the body. In her case, the spots from the chicken pox, especially the red patches on her legs, did not fade away. Eventually, red patches started appearing on other parts of her body.

The effects of severe psoriasis are seen here.

Over the past 30 years, Malik has tried an array of treatments for her condition – everything from creams to photo light therapy to bathing in a cold tar solution. None has been completely successful.

Then, after taking part in a clinical trial for Amevive from 2001 to 2003, Malik had clear skin for the first time in 30 years. The itching went away and the scales and red patches on her skin disappeared.

Malik said the drug has allowed her to do things she never would have contemplated in the past.

"The first thing for me was being able to go through a summer and wear shorts and T-shirts and not be afraid to show my skin," she said. "I went swimming for the first time since I was six. And I was able to go to work and hold my head up high and not worry about what people would say."

In October 2004, Amevive was approved in Canada for the treatment of patients with moderate to severe psoriasis. It has also been approved in Israel, the United States, Australia and Switzerland.

Glenn Block, Biogen Idec Canada's associate director of marketing and dermatology, said one of the major advantages of Amevive is that, unlike other drugs, it does not have major side effects.

Another benefit is that sufferers can experience treatment-free periods for considerable lengths of time, so they don't have to be on the drug continuously.

"There really hasn't been an effective therapy that allows for reasonable efficacy without the side effects associated with some of the other medications," said Block. "The big advantage and the unmet medical need is an effective therapy for the moderate to severe patient without the side effects associated with the traditional therapies."

Block added that "for moderate to severe patients, this is an effective treatment with a very solid safety profile."

For more information about the drug, talk to a dermatologist or visit http://www.biogen.com/site/016.html.

Feet critical to health, experts say

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

From a young age, children are taught that their "foot bone's connected to the hip bone," but most people don't realize how important this early biology lesson is.

Dr. Katrina Kulhay, director and founder of the Kulhay Wellness Centre, stresses that more often than not, it's problems with feet that cause most back and knee problems. "If they're having any pain in their feet, knees, hips or back, go to the bottom of the feet. Nine times out of 10, people have something wrong with their feet. The arches are either too high or too low, or they're rolling inward or rolling outward."

Kulhay adds, "Whatever's happening at the bottom of the totem pole will affect the top of the totem pole."

According to Kulhay, who's a nutritionist, an acupuncturist and a chiropractor, many people are unaware that they might not be walking right or their feet need correcting, and they wait until they're already in pain before seeing a doctor.

"My thing is, prevention is better," says Kulhay. "It's much better to be proactive than reactive. You don't want to be having a knee problem. The statistics are, if your foot rolls four degrees inward, then the ankle rolls the knee in by 11 degrees which rolls the hip in by 18 degrees, so one causes the next causes the next which is why the feet are critical."

Back and hip problems are not the only issues that damaged feet can cause. There are numerous ailments that affect the feet directly.

"Bunions are a good example of arches rolling inward," says Kulhay. "Flat feet, shin splints, corns and calluses all indicate that there's an improper weight barrier."

Kulhay says that everyone needs to get their feet looked at, but for most people the best time to get checked has long since past.

Between birth "and your teens, the foot is changing dramatically. So the younger you can get a child in to look at how they walk, the earlier you can change it," she says.

However, it's never too late for a foot inspection, and adults should get their feet looked at too, Kulhay says.

There are several ways doctors can check for feet ailments. At Kulhay's wellness centre, she places her patients on a mat connected to a computer, which then maps out the foot's bone structure.

"The computer will spit right out how their foot is moving. The second thing that I do is examine their foot," she says.

The computer is the best way to look at feet, because the mat's 1,024 cameras show "where the pressure is, every wiggle and jiggle in the foot," Kulhay says.

Dr. Richard Klein, a family physician, suggests that to prevent ailments such as bunions and ingrown toenails, people check their own feet regularly.

"Just check to see if your nails are cut and that there are no other marks or rashes."

But Klein says structural problems such as flat feet can only be checked by a doctor.

Both Klein and Kulhay say that having the proper footwear can help prevent or relieve foot pain.

"Bunions are usually caused by the type of shoe people wear," says Klein. "They have to be corrected surgically, but they are preventable if you wear comfortable shoes."

Many stores carry the generic orthotic insoles, but Klein and Kulhay agree that while they might alleviate some pain, getting a custom-made orthotic is the right way to go.

"Generic orthotics may help, but they're definitely not as good as custom made," says Klein.

No one wants to have ugly shoes, but a custom-made orthotic doesn't mean giving up on fashion.

Many brands, such as Mephisto and Birkenstocks, specialize in orthotics, but before running to the nearest shoe store to buy special footwear, Kulhay advises people to figure out which shoe suits their daily needs.

"For young children, it's always running shoes, so you must get them in the proper running shoe. For office people, high heels is not where it's at, because all the pressure is on the front part of the foot. Always wear a lower, flat shoe when you're at work.

"We look at the person, their lifestyle, what do they do for a living. You can still have attractive shoes, like high heels, but you just don't have to wear them all day long."

Even after getting checked by a doctor, many people still need help finding the right shoe for them. Barb Huziak, a store manager at The Foot Shoppe makes sure she's well acquainted with her customers needs before suggesting the right shoe.

"You need to analyze the problem. All the staff is trained to analyze and suggest and obviously you put them in the shoe to see if it would work for them because every foot is different. We carry several different manufacturers, because one shoe is not going to fit 100 per cent of the population."

Whatever the footwear, your feet need to be looked after.

"Bones are supposed to be a certain shape," says Klein. "Bones can get deformed from standing on them over the years, so that's why it's pretty common to have problems."

Foot problems increase with age

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

One in six adults has foot problems, a figure that increases with age or disease.

Dr. Leslie Goldenberg, a geriatric internist in Toronto, recognized this, and in 1997, founded the first Walking Mobility Clinic in downtown Toronto. The clinic helps patients manage their gait, lower extremity, foot and ankle problems.

"Hospitals have cut back on lower extremity services," Goldenberg says, adding that the Walking Mobility Clinics offer a rare comprehensive treatment.

Goldenberg, is the medical director of the Walking Mobility Clinics and an assistant professor of medicine at the University of Toronto who is associated with Mount Sinai, Baycrest, Rouge Valley and the University Health Network hospitals. The mobility clinics now have six regional centres with campuses in downtown Toronto, North York, Markham, Pickering, Mississauga and Richmond Hill. A centre will open in Barrie in the spring.

Goldenberg says the clinics' program provides a one-stop assessment and treatment model that employs a team of physicians and foot-care specialists.

"People with chronic illnesses – diabetic, arthritic, heart conditions and others – must have proper pedorthic solutions to overcome their problems. A goal at the clinic is to educate clients to help them function better," he says.

"The vast majority of pain problems are related to abnormal biomechanics of the feet."

Support groups help patients cope with cancer

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN and CYNTHIA GASNER

Members of two local groups have proven that positive things can come out of a diagnosis of cancer.

After Eva Karpati's bout with breast cancer about three years ago, she joined Wellspring, a support centre for patients and their families living with cancer, and she learned how to quilt.

"I discovered that quilts can be very comforting to someone who is not feeling well, and I wanted to do something for a member of our group who needed more treatment."

Karpati found an organization in Quebec that makes quilts to donate to people dealing with cancer. "I called them, and a few weeks later, they delivered a quilt to the woman.

"I was overwhelmed. These people did not know me at all, and they just sent it right out."

She thought she would like to do something similar here, so about a year ago she placed some advertisements in, among other places, The CJN, for a proposed planning meeting.

"The response was tremendous. About 20 women showed up. Some were quilters, and others had been touched by cancer and just wanted to help out."

After arranging for space donated by Barbara Frum Library and getting materials donated from such places as The Lace Place, Creative Bags and Summerset Linens, Karpati obtained some quilting patterns, and the group got to work.

Seen at a recent presentation of L'Chaim Cancer Support Group for Jewish Women titled Nutrition and Cancer are, from left, Beverley Giblon, Nelly Jarnicki, Elizabeth Ehrlich, guest speaker, dietician, Pauline Wisdom-Gilliam, L'Chaim chair Marsha Urowitz, and Noreen Starr.

"In the past year, we've begun working on about 10 quilts, and we've given away three."

An average of about 15 quilters turn up every week, says Karpati. "It is a very social group and many friendships have been struck up.

"The thing that draws them to the group is that it is very hands-on. They walk away each evening feeling as if they have created something."

The quilters have received tremendous feedback, says Karpati. "Recipients have told us they feel the loving hands that have gone into the quilts."

The community support has also been great, she says. "I came up with the idea, but people have really come through."

The group is looking for a permanent home and always needs volunteers and materials, she says.

L'Chaim Cancer Support Group for Jewish Women was formed in 1999 by cancer survivors who were committed to helping other Jewish women cope with cancer.

The group recently held an educational meeting about cancer and nutrition because there is a great interest in learning how to eat properly to maximize health, said Elizabeth Ehrlich, a co-founder of L'Chaim with Marci Tenenbaum.

"Re-shaping your diet and eating well is one way in which you can actively participate in your care," said Pauline Wisdom-Gilliam, a dietitian with the Toronto Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre.

"It's something you can do to make a difference in your health and well-being before, during and after your treatment," she said.

L'Chaim also presents cancer awareness programs and "serves as an informal support network of our own volunteers," says Ehrlich. "This allows for lots of enjoyable interaction between our volunteers and clients."

Under the guidance of Wisdom-Gilliam, the group devised an eating guide that includes sections on anti-oxidants, healthy carbs, soy foods for women with breast cancer and a selection of healthy recipes.

Marsha Urowitz, chair of L'Chaim, says a healthy diet is one of the key elements that cancer patients can control.

Jewish doctors developing vasectomy alternative

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

A breakthrough in male contraception that could offer a reversible alternative to the standard vasectomy may be just a few years away, and Jewish doctors are at the leading edge of the research.

Shepherd Medical, a U.S.-based biotech company headed by Vancouver's Dr. Neil Pollock and Dr. Larry Zaneveld of Chicago, has developed and is currently testing the "intra vas device" (IVD), a flexible, hollow, silicone plug that is inserted into tiny holes in men's vas deferens tubes to block sperm transport from the testicles to the penis. The holes then heal rapidly and completely.

The reversible procedure takes 30 minutes under local anesthetic, and may cost under $1,000 if it's approved and widely commercialized, the company says.

Preliminary studies in primates and humans show the IVD may be as effective as a vasectomy. But its biggest advantage may be that it's easily reversible, as shown by the re-establishment of sperm flow in primates.

Vasectomy reversal is a four-hour-long microsurgery under general anesthetic, with only about a 60 per cent success rate. By contrast, IVD reversal could be much faster, with better results in terms of sperm flow re-establishment and pregnancy, because the vas deferens are not cut and cauterized as in a vasectomy, and since only tiny holes in the tubes are needed for removable.

Zaneveld initially developed a version of the IVD at Chicago's Rush University in the 1980s, but his research stalled when he ran out of funding.

Some 15 years later, Pollock, a physician and mohel who specializes in no-scalpel vasectomies, had a similar idea. He developed and prototyped his own device with the help of a biomedical engineer at the University of British Columbia.

"In the course of performing no-scalpel, no-needle vasectomies, I wondered how we could take male contraception to the next level. The need for an implantable, reversible device for men, like an IUD for women, became obvious," Pollock said.

"Before embarking on testing, I did further research to see if anyone else was doing anything similar, and I found Zaneveld's research in a number of older medical journals."

The two doctors formed Shepherd Medical in 1999 in conjunction with a group of Minneapolis businessmen who were interested in the concept.

The company acquired the intellectual rights to Pollock's device, but because Zaneveld's IVD had already gone through testing in rats, primates and humans, it was prioritized for continued research, refinement and testing.

Together with other doctors, Pollock and Zaneveld spent the next six years collaborating to improve and re-patent the IVD.

Shepherd Medical was recently awarded a grant of $1.4 million (US) from the U.S. National Institutes of Health to conduct new human clinical trials that are slated to begin this year.

But the firm requires another $10 million (Cdn) to bring the product to market, Pollock said.

A study by San Clemente, Calif.-based Focus Research Group, which analyzed the IVD's market potential, found there would be a $310 million (US) annual market for the product in the United States alone.

"We anticipate it might be approved in Europe first and then later in North America, because the regulatory hurdles are more difficult in the U.S.," Pollock said.

Shepherd Medical recently formalized a relationship with Jewish doctors Bob and David Fischell, an American father-and-son team with more than 100 U.S. biotech patents to their name, who will help company develop and improve the IVD over the next few years.

The Fischells have developed and commercialized such technology as a radio-controlled rechargeable pacemaker and an implantable insulin pump.

Biomechanical evaluation offered

At the Walking Mobility Clinics, patients get a full biomechanical evaluation. If they require a pedorthic solution such as accommodative footwear, customized insoles, braces or mobility devices, there are onsite labs with professionals who participated in the evaluation. They follow up with the patients and make any necessary adjustments.

Goldenberg notes that custom insoles align the lower legs and feet to improve function and remove pain from the lower extremities. "Orthotics are never dispensed in isolation but always recommended as the footbed of suitable supportive footwear."

The clinics also provide programs that stress healthful walking. "Walking programs improve your heart, lungs and muscle function." He stresses that the therapeutic walking programs are prescribed for diabetics, heart and chronic lung disease patients and those who are overweight, arthritic and/or aged.

The clinical team takes a multidisciplinary approach that includes access to a rheumatologist, an orthopedic surgeon, a wound-care specialist, a dermatologist, a vascular surgeon, a podiatrist/chiropodist and a pedorthist.

"We frequently see patients with chronic foot pain who have spent large sums of money on expensive footwear and custom insoles, only to find that they have not been properly diagnosed," Goldberg said.

He told The CJN that in Canada, anyone can set up a shop, make orthotics and sell them. "There are no government or industry standards and as [it is] an unregulated service, I have accumulated quite a collection of fraudulent orthotics."

Physician services offered at the Walking Mobility Clinics are covered by the Ontario Health Insurance Plan, Workers' Compensation Board and other insurers. Patients are seen on a referral basis and most patients are referred by family physicians.

Supportive devices urged for polio survivors

"I don't think there's any way we can prevent it from happening," she says. "But once you come down with it the key is to pace yourself. I know so many people who have had bad falls and a polio wound doesn't heal well."

"The idea is to conserve to preserve," says Brazer, who volunteers regularly at Baycrest and is active in the Beth Tzedec synagogue.

"Someone once told me about the energy conservation principal: On the days when you're feeling really lousy, try to do a little bit more than you can. On the days when you're feeling good, do a little bit less. Otherwise, if you overextend yourself, you're going to crash."

Both Nichols and Brazer encourage the use of supportive devices, like wheelchairs, but they recognize it can be a difficult step for polio survivors to take.

"You see others who have ended up in the motorized wheelchairs," Nichols says. "And a lot of people are afraid of that. Many won't use chairs or crutches. They might use a brace because you can hide it."

Brazer recalls the first time she attended a polio conference.

"I saw all those people in wheelchairs. I panicked and I left. I didn't go back to a meeting for two years. So there's a certain kind of stereotyping. But now I use a cane seat for standing. That enables me to go to the bank, buy my groceries, go to the movie theatres and stand in line. So the mobility aides are an enabler."

It's this positive attitude that has helped Brazer to cope with her illness and continue to do the activities she loves. She says she has adopted the motto dafka, Hebrew for "in spite of."

"I try not to be in denial. In spite of the fact that I don't have much money, that I feel lousy most days, I'm still going to follow my dreams. I'm still going to follow my goals, and carry on carrying on."

Food, Scrumptious Food

Kasha recipes will elevate food to new heights

By NORENE GILLETZ

I first met Margaret H. Dickenson in 1997 at a culinary convention. On the trip back to Canada, we spent nearly three hours in the Denver airport waiting for our connecting flights, talking about cooking, recipes and our culinary careers. We were amazed to discover that we shared the same birthday, which created a strong bond that continues to flourish over the years.

We've met several times at culinary conferences and still phone each other each year on our mutual birthday to catch up on our foodie adventures.

Dickenson is extremely accomplished. She is the author of the international award-winning cookbook From the Ambassador's Table (Times Editions Singapore, 1996, and Random House of Canada, 1997). She has taken her culinary and entertaining expertise to television where she is the creator and host of an international award-winning 26 episode lifestyle and cooking series, Margaret's Sense of Occasion. I watch her show when I can, taking delight in her creative and elegant entertaining style.

Her first video, New Holiday Traditions, was launched in November 2002. Soon to be aired is a series of Margaret's Entertaining Minutes. She is currently completing her second cookbook and is also working on a second TV series. She also is a freelance writer and frequent presenter of specialty courses, gives demonstrations and keynote speeches for major institutes and organizations (e.g., Le Cordon Bleu Paris Cooking School in Ottawa, the University of Ottawa and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service) and events (e.g.,wine and food shows, festivals and fundraisers). She regularly appears on local and national TV as well as in newspapers and magazines.

She accompanied her Canadian Foreign Service spouse, Larry Dickenson, to many fascinating countries around the world for almost 30 years. (During the last two assignments, her husband was the Canadian ambassador.) She took her responsibilities as a foreign service spouse very seriously in supporting her husband and his career, which included personalized and creative entertaining for which she has developed a strong international reputation.

I was not surprised when I learned that Dickenson recently swept all three categories of the Birkett Mills' International Association of Culinary Professionals (IACP) buckwheat recipe competition, winning two first prizes and a second. This very elegant lady takes kasha to new heights with the following prize-winning recipe, which she so kindly shared with me. I absolutely adore kasha in any form and am delighted to share this new twist on a familiar old-world dish with you, my readers.

MARGARET DICKENSON'S FRUIT & NUT BUCKWHEAT PILAF – FIRST PRIZE

With its charming flavours and textures, the versatility of this currant and nut buckwheat pilaf is remarkable. Fresh chives and a mustard herb vinaigrette add an interesting zip. Served warm, cold or at room temperature, it is always a treat! With cooked buckwheat groats on hand, this is a no skill, no time recipe.

2 tbsp. crushed chicken bouillon cubes (or powder)
2 cups hot water
1 cup whole buckwheat groats (see note)
⅔ cup currants
½ cup chopped hazelnuts or pecans
¼ cup finely chopped fresh chives
2½ tbsp. vinaigrette, a mustard and herb type salt and crushed black peppercorns to taste pinch granulated sugar (optional)

In a small saucepan, dissolve crushed bouillon cubes in hot water; place over high heat and bring to a boil. Stir in buckwheat groats and immediately reduce heat to low, covering saucepan tightly. Simmer until groats are just tender, about 15 to 17 minutes. (Avoid over cooking.)

Pour cooked groats into a large wire sieve; turn gently with a fork and drain extremely well. Immediately, transfer groats to a couple of large plates and spread. With a fork, gently turn kernels to stop cooking process and to allow extra moisture to escape.

Let groats cool and rest for at least 30 minutes before using or refrigerate. Groats become drier (i.e., less sticky) and firmer (i.e., not mushy) as they cool and rest. This makes about 2½ cups of cooked groats.

Toss together cooked buckwheat groats, currants, nuts, chives and vinaigrette. Season with salt and pepper. If desired or necessary, add a pinch of sugar to strategically balance the acidic flavour of the vinaigrette. Refrigerate at least briefly allowing flavours to develop, or until ready to use. (It may be necessary to add a touch more vinaigrette before serving.)

Serve pilaf warm, cold or at room temperature. Makes 3½ cups.

Note:

• Whole buckwheat groats are dehulled, unroasted buckwheat kernels. They are available in health food stores as well as some supermarkets and speciality food stores.

• Stored in airtight plastic containers, cooked buckwheat groats as well as any leftover pilaf, retain their quality for 2 days in the refrigerator or for weeks in the freezer.

Israeli ambassador stops off in Toronto ...

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

In a speech that kicked off a series of lectures called "Being Jewish on Campus," Israeli ambassador to Canada Alan Baker, urged Jewish students to educate themselves to combat anti-Israel sentiments coming from both Jews and non-Jews.

"The tendency of young Jewish students to be persuaded or convinced to think or act against Israel is indicative of the fact that they don't know, that they haven't had the education and they don't know the answers," Baker says.

Last week's lecture, which was put together by Hillel of Greater Toronto and Beth Tikvah Jewish Education Centre, tackled the challenges facing Jewish students on campus and used the Israel Apartheid Week put together by Arab student groups at the University of Toronto as an example.

"The Arabs have put on what I consider to be an offensive series of lectures and events, equating Israel with an apartheid," Baker says.

"That is not to say that Arab students or other students do not have the right to organize a seminar on campus to express their grievances or try to indicate their opinions, but to use that kind of labeling, which is deliberately intended to indicate an element of criminality, and to attach that to Israel becomes malicious. The university authorities could have prevented it."

Eric Levin, a third year political science student and the co-chair of Israel affairs at York University, introduced the ambassador by saying it isn't easy for Jewish students to promote their pro-Israel views on campus without facing a backlash.

"Students like myself across campuses in North America are facing tough times while advocating for Israel. We are currently sitting on the front lines, facing wave after wave of anti-Israel propaganda on our campuses," he says.

Baker, who served in the Israeli Foreign Ministry as a top-ranking legal adviser for the government, says the best way for students to combat "propaganda, which is sometimes cleverly devised, but usually very shallow," is to educate themselves about the role that Israel plays.

"Once [Arab students] see that there is a concerted, serious group of people who are capable and willing to stand up to [propaganda] and prevent this, they will usually back down," he says.

Baker offered another tactic to deal with anti-Israel events on campuses like the Israel Apartheid Week.

He says while protesting is an option, he feels it is better to ignore such demonstrations. He says that protesting the event would generate more publicity and media attention, which is exactly what propaganda-peddlers want.

But this approach struck a chord with Lou VanDelman, the executive director of Jewish War Veterans of Canada, who was in the audience.

He disagrees with Baker's theory that if we ignore this kind of event, it will go unnoticed, and says this passive approach is the wrong message to give to students.

"You say that Israel Apartheid Week is not important and that we shouldn't give it any credence, [but] I assure you that it got international attention," VanDelman says.

"The belief that if you don't give it any mention it'll go away [is wrong]. Hitler also came, and people said 'don't do anything, it's a passing fad,' and you know what that passing fad became."

He continued to say that the issue affects the entire Jewish population, not just students. He says Jews can no longer afford to ignore the anti-Israel sentiments that are growing stronger every day, and should start to attack Palestinians with the same tactics they use to attack Israelis.

But Baker says Israel will never resort to the "low form of propaganda" that Palestinians promote, and neither should students.

"The Palestinians make a point of putting out pictures of headless children and blood and guts. We don't do it. We will never show a picture of a dead child. It is against our religious principles," Baker says.

VanDelman expressed his frustration with Israel's failure to change its negative image.

"In terms of public relations, Israel has fallen behind. We are always on the defence. We should be on the attack. We should be telling the world what Israel has given to the world."

Levin agrees that advocating for Israel is the first step in changing its reputation.

"My job, and the job of many other students across North America is to show these positive perspectives to other students and the wider community," he says.

Baker admits this is not going to be an easy task, and does not have all the answers.

"I can't come with a magic wand and say, 'This is the answer to all the problems.' We are dealing with this with one hand tied behind our backs. And this is why I said from the beginning, the challenge facing Jewish students is a difficult challenge. It's not easy and it has to be taken seriously."

VANCOUVER — Israel's new ambassador to Canada visited Vancouver and Victoria last month to discuss the political situation in the Middle East.

Alan Baker's Vancouver itinerary, co-ordinated by the recently formed Pacific region branch of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC-BC), the successor to the Israel Action Committee, included an address to the faculty of law at the University of British Columbia, a meeting with Vancouver Mayor Larry Campbell, interviews with the local CBC and the Vancouver Sun and a talk to some 300 students and their teachers from all five Jewish community day schools.

CIC-BC spokesperson Michael Elterman said people in BC were anxious to hear Baker, who was appointed ambassador last fall.

"Everybody wanted to meet him because of his understanding of the peace process and because he knows Mahmoud Abbas, the new Palestinian president, quite well," Elterman said.

In his address to Vancouver's 15th Town Hall Meeting at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, Baker discussed the latest developments in Israel and the Palestinian territories.

He told the audience of about 350 that the election of Mahmoud Abbas is an important event. "There was an outpouring of grief and sympathy when [Yasser] Arafat died, but now it has been replaced by relief and the hope that we can move toward peace," he said. "I'm guardedly optimistic that it will."

Baker said peace between Israel and the Palestinians depends on stopping the terrorist attacks and the Palestinians' incitement of violence.

To do that, however, presents Israel with a dilemma. "How does Israel fight a war and remain a free, democratic country?" he asked. "It's like fighting with one hand tied behind your back. To do it, Israel has to experiment with different methods, in order to find the ones that work."

Baker said Canada should play a bigger role in Middle East diplomacy.

"Canada can, for example, export liberal, Canadian values and encourage other countries to play positive roles in the region instead of financing terrorism," he said. "Canada should do the same in the United Nations, too."

A crowd of 25 well-behaved protesters lined the sidewalk outside the JCC on 41st Avenue. Security was tight during the meeting, but there were no disturbances.

Elterman said the purpose of CIC-BC is to promote "the Israel behind the headlines." The organization was formed in the fall of 2004 to build upon the efforts of the Israel Action Committee and to mount a co-ordinated and community-funded pro-Israel advocacy effort.

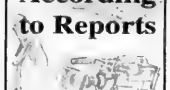
A small step toward peace in the Middle East?

According to Reports



By PAUL MICHAELS

The Canadian media greeted with cautious optimism the news that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas will meet Feb. 8 at a summit hosted by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak at the Egyptian resort of Sharm el-Sheik. Jordan's King Abdullah will also attend.

The National Post's Feb. 3 lead story on the summit, "Peace Gets A Chance," by Soraya Sarhaddi Nelson of Knight Ridder Newspapers, included large, four-colour headshots of the four leaders.

While speculating that the summit "will provide the first real chance for Israel and the Palestinians to discuss peace issues" after four years of conflict, the Post article nevertheless cautioned that "the distance between [Sharon and Abbas] remains enormous. The current climate of optimism notwithstanding, stable, lasting peace may be far off."

Nelson concluded: "Mr. Sharon wants the talks to focus on a single issue; ending Palestinian violence... Mr. Abbas has his eye on far more, including a formal truce, the release of Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails and blanket amnesty for Palestinian terrorists."

The Globe and Mail's coverage was relegated to page A15 ("Abbas, Sharon look to summit to start new era," by Matthew Kalman, Feb. 3). Kalman described the meeting as "another important step toward peace," but also warned about reading too much into it.

Kalman reported on the probable results of the summit: "Mr. Abbas is expected to make a formal announcement of a ceasefire at the summit... For his part, Mr. Sharon will announce the transfer of security control to the Palestinians in several West Bank cities, the gradual release of prisoners held in Israeli jails and an effective amnesty for fugitive Palestinian terrorists."

Kalman noted: "Amos Gilead, an Israeli Defence Ministry official, hinted that Israel was so impressed by Mr. Abbas's success in calming militants that it was considering halting its policy of targeted killings of terrorists." Israel might even agree to a formula established with the Palestinians whereby wanted militants who hand over weapons and forswear violence will no longer be targeted by Israel.

Israeli analysts have been pleasantly surprised by Abbas's deployment of Palestinian security forces to help ensure the de facto ceasefire is maintained, and that he is doing so in co-operation with the IDF. Unlike Yasser Arafat, Abbas is seen as honest, reliable and committed to ending the violence, and that is very good news indeed.

Abbas is seen as honest, reliable and committed to ending the violence

Still, Israeli experts warn that once a formal Palestinian ceasefire is announced, the onus will suddenly and forcefully shift to Israel to make additional concessions. In the absence of a proper sequencing of security measures as laid out in the internationally sponsored, performance-based "road map" peace plan, Sharon may be very reluctant to fulfil these demands.

Meanwhile, on the same day (Feb. 2) that the Sharm el-Sheikh summit was announced, in Northern Ireland the IRA declared that it will not fulfil its promise to decommission arms, leading many to fear a collapse of the 1998 "Good Friday" peace agreement between Britain and the Irish group.

The IRA's position parallels that of Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades and other Palestinian factions that refuse to disarm in accordance with the road map. The implications for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict should not be overlooked, despite early positive signs of co-operation between Israel and the new Palestinian Authority leadership.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

WHO ARE DOING IT RIGHT

ON A MISSION TO SAVE ZION

These students and their friends need your help to continue!

Last week a series of hateful, anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic events entitled "Israeli Apartheid Week" took place at the University of Toronto. The organizers of this week repeatedly called for the destruction of Israel in their lectures, as well as spreading incitement and hatred toward the thousands of Jewish students that attend the university.

The students of Betar-Tagar, from universities across Canada, were the only university group to oppose the "Israeli Apartheid Week". They researched, planned, and mobilized students to counter each and every speaker and hateful event that took place during that week. They did so with pride, dignity and tenacity and were well received by the • National and international media • Onlookers • Students • University administration

For the past two years, Betar-Tagar students have promoted Israel on campuses throughout Canada in an effort to counter the increasing wave of anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist sentiments rampant on today's campuses.

These students spend countless hours of their own time and personal resources to defend Israel. They stand tall against hatred and bigotry and refuse to stand tall for them. To continue this vital work, they need YOUR help.

Winnipeg exhibit recalls Jews killed at Mauthausen

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada's newest exhibit represents the first-ever collaboration between the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and the government of Austria.

"Walking On: Remembering Mauthausen" officially opened last month at the Marion and Ed Vickar Museum of Western Canada at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

The travelling exhibition – it appeared briefly in December at the Koffler Centre for the Arts in Toronto – is based on the photographs of Austrian artist Cathrine Stukhard.

Otto Ditz, Austria's ambassador to Canada, came for the opening along with Matthias Radosztics, director of the Cultural Forum at the Austrian Embassy.

A keynote speaker was Rabbi Peretz Weizman, Winnipeg's senior rabbi and a Holocaust survivor who was also liberated on Jan. 17, 1945.

The photos are hung on yellow walls, to recall the yellow stars Jews were forced to wear.

Attached to the floor in front of the photos are neatly arranged pairs of shoes.

From the exhibit "Walking On"

Mauthausen in Austria was the first concentration camp the Nazis built outside of Germany. During its existence, it housed close to 200,000 prisoners, half of whom died from inhumane conditions or due to the cruelty of the guards.

"The photos are supposed to be more metaphorical than documentary," said Susan Turner, the Jewish Heritage Centre's newly appointed curator and a photo artist.

"Many of the photos speak to the issue of memory. They make us ponder the many lost and broken lives and dreams. They help us to accept the ungraspable."

Philip Weiss, a leading Holocaust educator in Winnipeg and a survivor of Mauthausen who went back to visit the site last winter with his daughter and granddaughter, said, "My feelings are different than others who have seen the exhibition.

"While the photos are magnificent, to me there are certain weaknesses in the exhibit. The photos are of the current site which is one of the best-preserved former concentration camps in Europe. [They] can't capture the real horror and depravity of what went on there. Maybe others will find these photos dramatic and moving, but I didn't, maybe because I was there."

Turner says the exhibition is generating a lot of interest. "We have had a number of non-Jewish seniors groups come to see it."

The exhibit will be on display here until mid-April.

Rabbi gets taste of non-profit management techniques

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Jason Rosenberg has a new take on his work now that he's part of a continuing education program teaching rabbis non-profit management techniques.

The assistant rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple is the first rabbi in Canada to take part in Professional Education for Excellence in the Rabbinate (PEER), a multi-denominational program in its second year. The year-long tuition-free program is funded by a grant from the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Foundation and run by Synagogues: Transformation and Renewal (STAR), a five-year-old initiative formed by philanthropists Edgar Bronfman, Michael Steinhardt and the late Charles Schusterman.

The PEER program is for rabbis who have been ordained within the last five years, although it is now being offered to rabbis who were ordained up to seven years ago.

Rabbi Rosenberg, a native of Connecticut who has worked at Holy Blossom – the largest Reform congregation in Canada – since his ordination from Hebrew Union College in 2001, heard about PEER from a friend who took part last year and "raved about it."

PEER addresses subjects such as organizational theory, working with a synagogue board, and volunteer engagement, said the rabbi in an interview at the temple.

He feels the timing of the program is "perfect. After you've been out about 10 years, you've probably already figured out how you're going to work." He doesn't know of any similar program that is as intense.

As one of three full-time rabbis and one part-timer at his synagogue, Rabbi Rosenberg is responsible for youth and young families, in addition to other duties. He is working on building a youth committee as his PEER project.

Rabbi Jason Rosenberg

The project – as well as two online courses, retreats at the beginning and end of the year, and interaction with two mentors, one a rabbi and one a business expert – is a key component of the program, which has 17 participants this year.

Rabbi Rosenberg said his approach to building the youth committee would be different if not for PEER. Until now, he said, he tended to try to address perceived voids with "programs that seemed to fill a need. It becomes a very haphazard way of running a program."

The PEER approach has made him "take a step back and really think about how to do things. We're too busy and don't naturally think strategically like this. Most of us don't come from a business world."

Rabbi Rosenberg, unlike some of his counterparts, doesn't believe that what he is learning from PEER should be part of the curriculum in rabbinical schools. "I think rabbinical school is short enough, and we have enough to learn. Rabbinical school is about making me a rabbi."

Also, he said, picking up business theory once one can actually apply it makes it easier to learn.

He believes both the Judaic component and the management component are important for rabbis to know. "The reality is, congregations are big institutions," he said. "We all care about our congregations. We're all trying to make them better."

The program is planning its first alumni retreat to give participants a chance to continue their education, said Rabbi Hayim Herring, executive director of STAR.

Canadian Jewish students learn to make difference

By ALIZA LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

If you want to make a difference, you have to get past the "9 a.m. moments."

That was the message delivered to 270 Jewish students from 32 Canadian colleges and universities who met in Montreal recently for "One weekend," a conference to discuss Jewish student issues, share programming ideas and connect with other Canadian Jewish students.

Student activist Sig Kal Shore, who spoke about inspiring students to take part in leadership development programming, said that effective programming starts with "3 a.m. moments" of inspiration, but requires "9 a.m. moments" of working hard, overcoming obstacles and following through.

Adam Conter, a student at McGill University and a member of Hillel Montreal, organized the conference with the help of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), a group founded last January to facilitate national communication, and other groups such as National Jewish Campus Life.

"This conference is groundbreaking because it is going to accomplish what it set out to accomplish – creating a network of national communication, which is something that is long overdue," said Conter.

Joelle Faulkner, a recent Rhodes Scholarship recipient, spoke about the need to help students hone their skills in campus programming and to empower them to dream big.

"We want you to see a vision that you don't think is attainable, and then we want you to see that it's attainable," she said. "You're going to see that you can do it."

Avrum Rosensweig, the director of Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, and Dr. Acol Dor, a Sudanese refugee who fled the country when she was eight after witnessing the murder of her family, both spoke at the conference.

Dor pleaded with the students to become involved in the crusade to stop the genocide in Sudan's Darfur region, and the students responded.

"An impromptu late-night meeting drew 40 students moved by Dr. Dor's speech. Out of the conference came a petition signed by over 100 students and a nationwide plan to raise awareness to take action on campuses about the crisis in Darfur," said Ben Fine, a fourth-year engineering student at the University of Western Ontario (UWO).

The students were encouraged by keynote speaker Irwin Cotler, the federal justice minister and attorney general, who spoke about the obligation of Jewish students to involve themselves in issues of human rights and social justice.

"If we do not get involved in issues of human rights in our time, we will not only diminish these causes by our absence, but we also diminish ourselves as Jews," Cotler said.

He encouraged the students to push their elected representatives for more action on Darfur and noted that a world response is needed.

"It is going to take a concerted effort of the international community," he said, noting that HIV/AIDS and poverty were causing thousands of deaths in Africa every day.

CFJS president Gary Diamond, a UWO law student, is optimistic about the future of Jewish campus activity.

"The conference was only four days in length, but it will undoubtedly have a lasting impact on campuses and Jewish students across the country," he said.

The most popular event was a party sponsored by Birthright Israel that was attended by 1,200 students from the conference and Montreal's Jewish community.

Sara Berger, the vice-president of programming and conference chair of CFJS said, "I knew the weekend was a success when I looked down and saw 1,200 Jewish students singing Am Yisrael Chai on the dance floor in the middle of a nightclub."

Rice: U.S. general to help Israelis, Palestinians with security

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice vowed active U.S. involvement in Middle East peace-making, saying Washington would dispatch a high-level "security co-ordinator" to the region and send more than $40 million in immediate aid to the Palestinians.

Speaking on Monday, ahead of her departure from Ben-Gurion International Airport in Israel, Rice said Gen. William E. Ward was chosen for the job of security co-ordinator. She said Ward would visit the region in coming weeks and report directly to her.

Ward, a decorated army officer, has served in South Korea, Germany, Somalia and Egypt and as the head of a NATO force in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Rice said Ward would supervise, among other things, reform of the Palestinian security forces. The extent of Ward's mandate remained somewhat unclear, including whether he would be asked to monitor compliance with the internationally brokered "road map" to Middle East peace.

But most important, Rice said, was to establish security. "Ward's mandate is on security which really has to be established."

The secretary of state said the security monitor would help Israel and the Palestinians on security issues, but that "we believe the best security co-operation is between the parties themselves."

She added that "the parties are showing a capability to make progress on their own. The U.S. does not believe that it is necessary to intervene just for the sake of intervening."

"The bilateral security co-operation is more important that anything that we could do trilaterally," she told reporters.

Rice also told reporters that Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon have accepted invitations for separate meetings with U.S. President George W. Bush at the White House in the spring. Bush had refused to invite former PA president Arafat to Washington.

On Sunday, Rice met with Sharon, President Moshe Katsav and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom.

Rice praised the recently elected Abbas for his adherence to his mandate to restore calm in Palestinian areas, saying that he had helped to jump-start peace efforts with Israel.

She said she had told Israel it must refrain from taking unilateral actions that would prejudge the outcome of future peace negotiations.

Rice also said she told Israel it must live up to its obligations under the "road map" peace plan, under which Israel was to have dismantled dozens of unauthorized West Bank settlement outposts and frozen settlement expansion, but has not done so.

"We did talk about the need to make sure that both obligations are carried out concerning settlements and outposts.

"[If] it looks as if there is somehow continued effort to create facts on the ground, then we do not support that," she added. Rice said Israel's planned withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and four northern West Bank settlements this summer should be seen as a major breakthrough.

"I just can't emphasize enough how historic a decision that is, how fundamental a decision that is, that with all of the going back and forth that we've done over the last 30 plus years, the return of territory is a major step forward."

Her meeting with Abbas ended years of strained relations between the United States and the Palestinians under the leadership of Arafat, who was shunned by Washington as a supporter of terrorism.

The Palestinians, in turn, had complained that President George W. Bush, at least in his first term, favoured Israel and was not active enough in trying to resolve the Middle East conflict.

Abbas indicated that he was told by Rice there would be an entire team of monitors to the region. "Indeed, the United States promised us that there will be monitors to help prevent any friction and tension," he said.

Rice had called on Israeli leaders to show the Palestinians that nonviolence produces results. "Don't undermine him," she warned in reference to Abbas.

The secretary of state also held talks with Vice Premier Shimon Peres and defence minister Shaul Mofaz before travelling to Ramallah.

All Falash Mura by 2007

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has decided that the remainder of the Falash Mura from Ethiopia will be brought to Israel by the end of 2007. To achieve this aim, the number of immigrants will be doubled starting in June 2005. The Jewish Agency, which had lobbied to double the monthly rate of Falash Mura aliyah, will take over the compounds where some 15,000 Falash Mura live while waiting to immigrate from Addis Ababa and Gondar. The compounds are currently run by the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry.

Products to be labelled

Israeli products made in the West Bank and Gaza Strip now will bear a special label in Europe. The move, which went into effect last week, resolves a longstanding dispute between European countries and Israel. It will allow European countries to tax products made beyond Israel's pre-1967 boundaries, which account for a small percentage of Israel's exports to Europe.

IDF soldiers wounded

Four Israeli soldiers were wounded last Thursday when Palestinians gunmen fired on their jeep near the settlement of Eshkolot, southwest of Hebron.

Fugitives no more?

Israel may call off its hunt for Palestinian terrorists if they disarm. Israeli sources said that under a proposed deal, fugitives who turn in their weapons and surrender to Palestinian Authority security forces in the West Bank and Gaza Strip will be taken off Israel's wanted list. The proposal was raised in a meeting between Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz and Mohammed Dahlan, a security adviser to PA President Mahmoud Abbas. Security officials from the two sides were to finalize an agreement this week, but the General Security Service (Shin Bet) was expected to raise objections. The Israeli security service doesn't want Palestinians who carried out murders to be part of the amnesty, Ha'aretz reported.

Suicide bombings called 'crimes against humanity'

The EU's justice, freedom and security commissioner has backed Jewish calls that suicide bombings be branded a crime against humanity. "Terrorism is a crime" against "fundamental and universal rights. We believe that this crime must be fought by the law and within the law," Franco Frattini told a Brussels conference last week. The remarks were seen as a boost to the Simon Wiesenthal Center, which is trying to organize an international declaration against suicide attacks that would give victims great latitude in prosecuting states or clerics that foment terrorism.

Israel to study anti-Semitism

Israel is creating a task force on anti-Semitism. The creation of the task force comes after a forum on anti-Semitism published a report saying anti-Semitism is up in Britain and saying the Palestinian Authority is promoting hatred of Jews and Israel. Israel's minister for Diaspora affairs, Natan Sharansky, will head the new task force.

Sharon, Abdullah talk

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon phoned Jordanian King Abdullah II and congratulated him on the recent birth of his son, Prince Hashem, and on his 43rd birthday. The two men agreed to meet at the Sharm el-Sheikh summit scheduled for Feb. 8.

BRUSSELS JEWISH COMMUNITY SEEKS RABBI

Beth Hillel, a 300-family Liberal congregation (in USA terms, situated between Reform and Conservative) in Brussels, Belgium seeks to recruit a new Rabbi who will lead the community in the challenging years ahead.

Founded 35 years ago by a dynamic and pioneering group of Belgian, American and English Jews, the community has grown and developed all these years under the spiritual and intellectual guidance of Rabbi Albert Dahan who is now retiring.

Ground has been broken for the building of a new, spacious modern building which will have excellent facilities for holding services, further developing the Hebrew school/ Talmud Torah and expanding community activities. Construction will be finished in the summer of 2005.

Beth Hillel was the first and remains the only officially-recognized Liberal synagogue in Belgium. Its many activities and projects are aimed at making the synagogue a center for prayer as well as a center of community life. The synagogue publishes a quarterly magazine of thoughtful religious and historical articles and community news.

The board is certain that the construction of the new synagogue will provide the necessary platform for the incoming Rabbi to take the congregation to the next stage of its expansion and development.

Candidates for this position should speak French (fluency can be acquired); knowledge of English is helpful.

Germany and Israel: bridging the bloody divide

These are the remarks of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on the occasion of the visit to the Knesset of Germany's President Prof. Horst Koehler.

I am very happy to stand here on the Knesset podium and welcome our guest, the president of Germany, Prof. Horst Koehler. This visit of the president of Germany in Israel, as a guest of the president of the State of Israel, is the first of a series of events which will mark 40 years of diplomatic relations between Israel and Germany.

However, it is held in the shadow of another event, which we marked only last week – 60 years since the liberation of the Auschwitz death camp.

The relations between the two countries – Israel and Germany – have been characterized, and will always be characterized, by these two symbolic dates. One marks the bloody divide which was opened between our two nations during World War II – a divide which will remain between us forever. The second tries to bridge the gap through a range of ties which has increasingly expanded over the years, and today constitute friendly relations and full and fruitful co-operation.

Even 60 years after the Holocaust, the pain over the terrible loss of millions of innocent Jews, who were massacred merely for being Jewish, has not faded. The Jewish people will never recover from the murder of their sons and daughters by the Nazis and their collaborators. There cannot be and there is no pardon and forgiveness for what the Jewish people suffered at the hands of the Germans. There cannot be and there is no pardon for the annihilation of European Jewry – an entire world of wisdom and industry, extraordinary talent which could have contributed greatly to all of humanity. All this was destroyed and lost in the worst and most terrible act of murder throughout history.

Mr. President, assuming moral responsibility for the sins of the past does not absolve the current European leadership from its responsibility for preventing future crimes against the Jewish people. For the sake of the future, it is important to persevere in educating the younger generation and wage an unceasing war against all expressions of anti-Semitism and racism, which have steadily increased in recent years. In light of these expressions of "new anti-Semitism," it is also Israel's duty to expand its efforts to inform the public of its unique situation and explain its position to the younger generation worldwide. If, in the past, anti-Semites were opposed to Jews being equal members of society, then the new anti-Semites deny the right of the Jewish people to defend themselves, as a state which is an equal member of the family of nations.

The new anti-Semites are inspired by a number of insincere leaders. They oppose hatred of Jews, denounce the Holocaust, and demand that people remember and never forget. However, at the same time, they undermine the legitimacy of the State of Israel, oppose the Jewish people's right to self-defence, object to the war against terror and to the struggle against countries and organizations such as Iran, Syria and the Hezbollah, which aim to destroy Israel.

The only way to ensure the existence of the Jewish people is a free Jewish state which is capable of defending itself. Whoever objects to this, in fact, condones hatred of Israel.

Mr. President, the different stations you will pass during your visit to Israel – Mount Herzl and Mount Zion, Tel Hashomer Hospital and Beit Hatefutzot, Sderot, the Weizmann Institute, the Hebrew University and Yad Vashem – will tell you, briefly, the story of this land.

Sixty years after the Holocaust, the tremendous achievements by the State of Israel in all fields serve to prove what we could have achieved with the help of those talented people who were destroyed. Despite the fact that we have meagre rainfall, our agriculture is among the most advanced in the world. Despite its small size, Israel is among the leading countries in the world in the field of high-tech, and is a member of the exclusive club of countries which launched satellites into space. It is a country in which the level of science, medicine and culture sparks envy throughout the world. It is a country which is considered the richest in the world in terms of intellectual capital. It is a country which is considered to have the best engineers in the world. It is a country in which five million residents absorbed an additional one million citizens within a decade – an impressive and unprecedented achievement in international terms.

The assistance we received from the government of Germany in many fields, is what enabled us to attain these achievements, and we certainly value this.

In the 40 years which have passed since the establishment of diplomatic ties between our countries, these have expanded increasingly and impressively. Germany has reiterated time and again its commitment to the security and welfare of Israel, and has backed up this commitment with actions in critical hours. Germany rose to Israel's assistance in the attempt to solve the painful humanitarian problem of our missing soldiers. I wish to thank all those who took part in these endeavours and the success achieved so far, and express the hope that our joint efforts will soon lead to the return of our remaining missing soldiers. Their anxious families and the entire Israeli nation are grateful to you for that.

Mr. President, I wish you an enjoyable and fruitful visit to our country, and to both countries – continued advancement on the path we have pursued for 40 years.

Thank you very much.

SISTERS REUNITED AFTER 61YEARS: Hannah Katz, left, and Klara Blaier were reunited in Ramat Gan last week after 61 years. The sisters live about 50 kilometres from each. Katz's granddaughter, Merav Zamir, located her 78-year-old grandmother through two testimony pages on the Yad Vashem's Internet site. One page was filled out by Zamir in 1999 and the other was completed by Blaier in 1993. Zamir, with the help Yad Vashem staff, contacted Blaier, now 81. The sisters were born, in the former Czechoslovakian town of Mukachevo. After the war, each married and moved to Israel. Now that the Yad Vashem on-line archive can be accessed on the Internet, tens of thousands of people all over the world have logged on to try to find information about missing relatives from the Holocaust era. Izenberg Goldberg Monuments
A 90 Year Community Tradition

For over 90 years, Izenberg Goldberg Monuments has been privileged to serve our Jewish community in the selection of carefully crafted memorials to their loved ones. We have always endeavoured to provide the highest quality of granite and workmanship ... at the lowest possible price to our clients.

Since 1955, with the acquisition of our own factory, located in North York, we are able to provide our clients with a complete design service, superior workmanship, and an ability to be even more competitive in the Jewish market.

Over the last number of years, the monument market has shifted to include the importation of granite from overseas. With our own factory, we are able to take advantage of the lower prices that buying large quantities of granite affords us. This also assures our clients that their memorial will be crafted under our direct supervision in a Jewish-owned factory.

Our compassionate staff have a combined family tradition as monument suppliers — Howard Izenberg (son of founder), together with Noam Friedman and Adir Lobart, offer many years of experience, sensitivity and the understanding needed to assist families at a very difficult time.

Our showroom is located at 3173 Bathurst St., 4 blocks north of Lawrence on the east side. Our hours of operation are Monday to Friday 9:30 a.m. - 5 p.m., Sunday, 9:30 a.m. to 3 p.m.; we are closed on Shabbat.

United Synagogue Day School
At USDS Literacy includes technology

As a parent, you want your child to be literate. The flood of information from the new media makes literacy all the more necessary, to sort the wheat from the chaff.

But literacy is no longer defined as reading and writing alone. It includes numeracy, the understanding of numbers, and technological literacy, the understanding of media other than the written word, especially electronic media.

These skills are not only essential in today's workplace. They are a lasting source of enjoyment, and mastering them increases a child's self-esteem.

United Synagogue Day School espouses this global concept of literacy. These skills are woven through the curriculum by means of Multiple Intelligences theory and Differentiated Instruction. Students learn all media working in English, French and Hebrew.

In Differentiated Instruction, the teacher considers each individual child's interests, learning styles and maturity. The teacher then shows the child his/her strengths and weaknesses, and helps that child to learn and to demonstrate his/her knowledge.

Multiple Intelligences theory draws on strengths to overcome weaknesses. For example, a child with weak arithmetic skills but strong spatial intelligence, may learn fractions more easily if they are shown as coloured blocks on a page.

As Head of School Lucy Cohen points out, "there's no 'common denominator' here. Every child can develop as far as possible. We design our programs so every student, boy or girl, can use them in his or her own way, at his or her pace."

When children see connections among subjects, and grasp why knowledge matters, they learn eagerly. A biology unit on butterflies may also help illustrate colour theory, drawing and animation. A unit on currencies for teaching arithmetic, can be related to history and geography as well as practical budgeting skills.

USDS' computer software fits diverse needs, including enriched and remedial learning. Teachers are trained to use laptops and data projectors in PowerPoint. Lead computer teacher Merav Anafi has received the ECOO (Educational Computing Organization of Ontario) teacher-of-the-year award.

Computer teaching is based on the partners-in-action model: the computer team works with teachers to create customized activities which build on current class themes, areas of study and student abilities. These activities, unique to USDS, impart valuable skills while enriching the curriculum.

USDS is pioneering Flash, a cutting-edge animation program. Animation helps students understand subject matter visually, and see processes in a logical, sequential way.

Students' achievements surpass expectations. Using computers, enriched Grade 3s complete ambitious projects with themes like Landmarks of Toronto. Grade 7-8 students, some entering multi-media science fairs, use Flash to show natural processes (e.g. particle theory), and incorporate animation in PowerPoint presentations. Grade 8 children prepare their own graduation videos.

USDS pioneered Macintosh Hebrew applications; but PCs allow better transfer of work between school and home, and easier appplication to Hebrew. Today, half of USDS' computer labs are PC, with the rest being converted.

Every skill entails new responsibilities. Accordingly, parents and their children together sign a contract to use technology responsibly.

Seniors teaching seniors at Bernard Betel Centre

Volunteer Mary Spring at work in the Computer Learning & Resource Centre

Seniors interest in learning computers is nothing new. Since opening its Computer Learning & Resource Centre (CLRC) in October of 2003, the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living has taught computer classes to over 300 adults 55+ in its friendly, comfortable learning environment.

Seniors mentoring seniors on computers "rewarding for both," teacher says

What is new is the growing number of seniors looking to offer their help as peer support volunteers in beginner and intermediate classes in the CLRC. Drawing on their own experience as well as the guidance of professional classroom instructors, Betel Centre members like Helen Goldfarb are discovering that you don't need to be an expert to assist others and at the same time, be rewarded with the joy of giving something back.

Volunteer Helen Goldfarb with student Sophie Chapnick

Helen was coming to the Betel Centre for fitness classes in late 2003 when a friend "volunteered" her to help in the CLRC. She'd used computers at work for over 15 years and hadn't been retired for long, so she was looking for meaningful ways to fill her time.

Despite being unsure at first of her ability to help others, Helen says she's enjoyed her volunteer experience, and keeps coming back "because I feel useful," and because of positive feedback from people she's helped in computer classes.

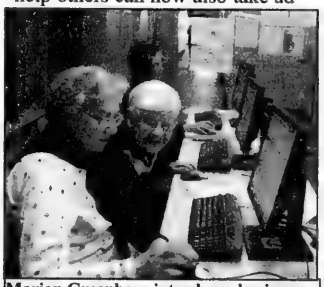
Michael James, Program Co-ordinator of the CLRC, says volunteering requires less technical knowledge and more a general "comfort level" with computers. "What's involved in helping someone learn how to use the mouse? Well, you need to know how to do it yourself."

As someone who chose a career in computers later in life, Michael recognizes that volunteers are often "in a learning curve themselves" and adds reassuringly, "you will never be asked to help someone do something you don't know how to do."

Volunteers have been essential to the CLRC's success from the very beginning, and come from all walks of life and diverse backgrounds.

Students often comment that having volunteers present during class and Open Lab periods has made all the difference to their learning experience. "If you have enough volunteers, it's almost like one-on-one instruction," says Cynthia Cohn, who's been using computers for fifty years and now chairs the Betel Centre's Computer Committee. She says that when seniors are learning, it's sometimes not enough to have a teacher giving instructions. "I'm a visual person – you have to show me. A volunteer can help right then and there."

Seniors who feel they need to gain confidence before they can help others can now also take advantage of a free five-week Computer Leadership Training program. Offered only to members of the Betel Centre who are already using computers, the course outlines the beginners' curriculum and gives students an opportunity to teach a sample class.



Marion Greenberg introduces beginner Zipporah Kogut to basic mouse skills

Participants also volunteer at least two hours per week in beginner classes. This offers a practical hands-on coaching component.

According to Michael, volunteers usually discover that, just as "you don't need to know the mechanics of an internal combustion engine to drive your car, you don't need a Ph.D. in particle physics to help someone send an email."

He's observed the pride seniors feel that "however long ago, they didn't know a modem from a monitor… and now they're comfortable enough to help someone else figure it out. It's rewarding for both of them."

Mohel linked to baby's death from herpes

NEW YORK — City health officials in New York are asking a court to stop a mohel from performing ritual circumcisions until they conclude an investigation into whether he passed the herpes virus to three infants, killing one.

The probe was launched after city officials connected three babies who tested positive for herpes with Rabbi Yitzchok Fischer, who had circumcised all three.

Rabbi Fischer, who has performed 350 circumcisions in the New York area, employs a traditional practice called metzitzah b'peh in which he uses his mouth to draw blood from the infant's wound. The custom is thousands of years old but a study last summer by Canadian and Israeli researchers, backed by a New York talmudic authority, recommended instead use of a sterile tube.

The researchers found eight babies who were infected with the herpes virus likely contracted their illnesses through oral metzitzah. One of the infants was born in Toronto.

Rabbi Fischer, 66, performed a bris (ritual circumcision) on twins in October 2004. Ten days later, one infant died of herpes and the other tested positive for the virus. A third infant on Staten Island also tested positive for herpes.

Health officials say the fragile immune system of infants is less able to cope with the virus than adults.

The city asked Rabbi Fischer to submit a blood test in November and ordered him to stop performing oral metzitzah pending the results. It went to court when it learned he was still performing circumcisions.

Reuters reported last week that Rabbi Fischer's lawyer, Mark Kurzmann, said his client is cooperating with the investigation. Kurzmann also suggested the infants might have contracted their infections some other way.

Appreciating the use of our senses

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

Two months ago, as I waited for my son at the orthodontist, I picked up a copy of Reader's Digest. I noticed that it had a reprinted article written by Helen Keller, who was deaf, mute and blind. Given her impediments, I was astonished by the sophistication of her thoughts and the eloquence and intelligence that shone through her words. I was deeply moved by her reflections that so obviously came from the depths of her heart and spirit.

In the article, Helen Keller described how she would spend her time if she had three days of sight. She spoke of how she would take special note of the sunrise and sunset, the moon, stars, mountains, sand, sea and all of the wonders of nature. She described the joy she would feel at being able to see the faces of her loved ones, and how she would take note of every nuance of their eyes, smile and expressions.

Even after my son's appointment was over, we stayed there until I could finish every word of her article. I left the office practically in tears. Helen's wisdom touched my heart and soul. Her words and sensitivities will forever be imprinted in my mind.

I have always been someone who notices details, with my senses alert. The singing of the birds in spring, the glory of the mountains in each season, the crisp scent of the air in winter and the colours of the sunset rarely go unnoticed. Yet, after reading Helen Keller's article, I was armed with a heightened awareness of all of the special images to take note of as they came within my purview.

We recently vacationed in Florida, and my eyes were glued to the glittering fireworks that lit up the sky of SeaWorld. I couldn't take my eyes off of the magical sights and lights that surrounded the audience in the spectacular show that concluded our evening there.

Don't think for a moment that I didn't notice, and cherish, the sight of my daughter dancing in Miami with her younger brother in her arms. We were outdoors on the boardwalk, where a live band played beautiful music, with the full moon shining down on the darkened nighttime ocean. The smiles of joy on my children's faces as they took in the excitement of Orlando and their laughter as they splashed in the water in the pool at the hotel have created memories for me that I will forever cherish.

I feel thankful, truly thankful for the gift of all of my senses. Some of us have not been endowed with this special gift. How we use our senses makes all the difference in our sense of joy and wellbeing.

May we use our eyes to appreciate what we already have – to look in our loved ones' eyes and see the goodness, to see and appreciate the lines of wisdom and experience etched on our parents' faces, to watch our children grow and thrive, to see the beauty of nature that surrounds us – no longer taking it for granted. It's all there. We just have to look, see, and take notice.

This article has been written in honour of my Dad, Baruch ben Saul's (of blessed memory) yahrtzeit. May his spirit soar higher with our special memories of him.

Hy Burstein's memoirs of a Jewish cowboy

Ride 'em Jewish Cowboy* by Hy Burstein, Devora Publishing

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Hy Burstein can't quite explain his passion for riding horses, only that it first hit him as a teenager and that it's still going strong. Burstein, who was born to Russian-Jewish immigrants in Toronto in 1928, has written about his riding experiences over the last six decades in Ride 'em Jewish Cowboy.

Sometimes known as "Riding Hy," the retired plastics-industry businessman has travelled the world seeking exotic trails. He's had equestrian adventures all over Canada, the United States, Mexico and Central America, Europe, China, India, Africa, Jordan and Israel.

"The last time I went riding was in September," said the 77-year-old grandfather. "I was 14 hours in the saddle, from nine in the morning until 11 at night."

That was at the TX Ranch, a large working spread near the Montana-Wyoming border where guests often pay $1,000 a week to herd cattle. Burstein has become such a regular there that his photograph adorns the cover of its brochure. His photo album is bursting with photos of himself and his sons in cowboy hats, roping and branding well-heeled specimens of brisket on the open range.

"I've ridden over 50,000 kilometres on a horse," he said. "I've pushed over 15,000 head of cattle up the mountains to the pasture in the spring and pushed them back down again to market in the fall."

He's also applied his expertise to scouting new properties for Equitor, an American firm that offers riding holidays around the world.

He started at 16 as a truck driver for his father's burlap bag company, and was soon driving in professional truck rodeos. At 18, he entered the professional boxing ring but didn't stay long. "Fate was good to me: I was lucky – I got clobbered. It taught me a good lesson. It kept me out of boxing. It would have been a terrible career."

He met and married his wife Zuzek, a former Miss Israel, during a visit to Israel in 1959, then returned home and purchased an isolated 100-acre farm in the Humber River Valley near Bolton. Dubbed Gan Eden Farm, it still affords good riding for his family each season. They also maintain homes in Toronto and Tel Aviv.

As chronicled in Ride 'em Jewish Cowboy, Burstein sought international riding adventures – and misadventures – whenever and wherever he could. Not all have been on horseback. He's endured 10 hours on an elephant in India and ridden a camel through the wondrous Siqh Canyon in Petra, Jordan.

He once encountered a 15-foot python on an Australian trail. Once in Africa, his party of riders unwittingly crossed between a lioness and her cubs. When the horses suddenly bolted, he looked back and saw a huge lioness dart between the trees. Their guide shouted at them to slow down; they did and the lioness didn't attack.

On a visit to the Vered HaGalil ranch in Israel's Galilee, he rode across the rolling terrain for several hours down to Lake Kinneret (the Sea of Galilee). "This was my first riding holiday in which my guide had his cellphone and a loaded pistol at his side at all times. The cellphone was used to keep in constant touch with the office in case of any emergencies and the pistol was in case of an attack from some disgruntled Arab." (Vered HaGalil later discontinued those off-ranch riding treks.)

The next day, he was again riding across the open countryside and a Canadian film crew spotted him and filmed him for a documentary that later aired on CBC.

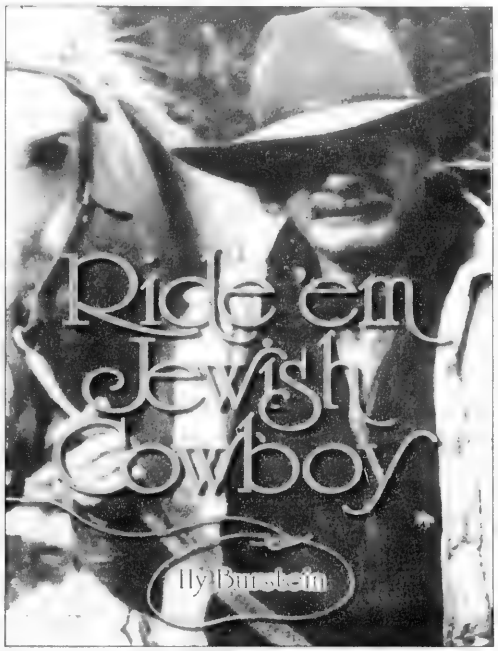
In all his years of riding, he's had numerous spills but no really serious injuries until he broke his collarbone in Turkey five years ago. The emergency surgery he had there involving clumsy surgical pins was at least 20 years out of date and had to be corrected in Toronto. He's clearly aware of the importance of getting back onto a horse after a fall. "The worst part about the accident was that I had to give up riding for almost an entire year," he laments.

Not surprisingly, Burstein has heard numerous anti-Semitic remarks on the trail – once even from the proprietor of the TX Ranch, who professed a dislike of Jews in his presence. "The next morning, I confronted Hip and asked him why he didn't like Jews, as I had met many of his Jewish guests... and all seemed quite nice and friendly," he writes.

"'They talk too loud and can be very noisy,' was his reply."

"'Noisy?' I asked. 'I've met dozens of your guests who, after their drinking binges, would keep me up all night with their loud voices, and believe me, they weren't Jewish. Besides, I'm Jewish.'"

"'What? You can't be, and if you are, you're different,' he replied in disbelief, and his face turned a deep red... I received and accepted his apology, and then his final words, 'Those Israelis sure know how to fight a war.'"



Asked about the incident, Burstein said he never considered ending the friendship. "He's a typical Montana redneck. But he smartened up pretty quickly after I told him I was Jewish. Funny thing about Hip – most of his guests are Jewish. I couldn't understand it."

A tenderfoot when it came to writing, Burstein said it took him nearly four years to complete the book. "My son bought me a typewriter. I don't know anything about computers. I gave the pages to my secretaries to retype and then we had to edit it and get it published."

But now he thinks he's gotten the hang of it. "I'm working on my second book now. It's fiction. It's completely different."

Writing, he said, is nothing like riding. "It's exhausting. It takes me an hour and a half to write one page. I never know what's coming next."

Burstein's book is available in some Jewish bookstores or through www.devorapublishing.com.

The Holocaust in film and on television

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Daniel Anker's thought-provoking documentary, Hollywood and the Holocaust, leaves you with the uncomfortable feeling that the American film industry has not always risen to the challenge in its treatment of the Holocaust.

His film will be aired by CBC-TV's The Passionate Eye on Sunday, Feb. 13 at 10 p.m., just two weeks after a procession of world leaders converged on Auschwitz to commemorate the 60th anniversary of its liberation.

The Holocaust is not the only subject Anker examines. He deals as well with Hollywood's response to the rise of Nazism in Germany.

Taking both topics into account, Anker reaches the sobering conclusion that Hollywood, in terms of its business decisions and its films, reacted unevenly to these interrelated events.

There was outrage and indifference and a need to understand and forget. In other words, Hollywood dealt with Nazism and the Holocaust in complex and often contradictory ways.

Long before the outbreak of World War II, Hollywood moguls, most of whom were Jewish, treated the Nazis with kid gloves for fear of losing a foothold in Germany's lucrative film market. Indeed, they bent over backward not to offend Germany, complying with Nazi demands to dismiss their Jewish representatives there.

And because these moguls worried about the prevalence of anti-Semitism in the United States – which was quite virulent and in the open in the 1930s and '40s – and did not want to alienate German Americans, their movies sometimes missed the point altogether.

Confessions of a Nazi Spy (1939) and The Mortal Storm (1940) were typical of the genre Warner Brothers and MGM churned out in the years before the U.S. entered World War II in 1941. Though solidly anti-Nazi, these films conspicuously avoided the use of the word "Jew." Anti-Semitism was an integral element of Nazi ideology, but the moguls preferred to substitute "non-Aryan" for "Jew."

Burt Lancaster in Judgment at Nuremberg

Joseph Goebbels, Germany's propaganda minister, was hardly impressed. He banned the distribution of all MGM films, including The Mortal Storm, a saga about a German-Jewish family caught up in the vortex of Nazism.

To be fair, the moguls had good reason to tread carefully. Joseph Kennedy, the U.S. ambassador to Britain and the father of a future president, had warned them on pain of retribution to desist from promoting American involvement in the war. His admonition was repeated by U.S. senators and congressmen and had a chilling effect on Hollywood.

Charlie Chaplin, the iconic actor, had no such qualms. His 1940 anti-Hitler independent film, The Great Dictator, went where no studio director would dare go.

Charlie Chaplin in The Great Dictator

Anker compares it unfavourably with I Married a Nazi, a mainstream puff piece that downplayed conditions in concentration camps.

In the immediate aftermath of the war, Gen. Dwight Eisenhower, the commander of Allied forces in Europe, invited a dozen studio heads to visit Nazi camps. So revolted by the atrocities were they that they produced a succession of graphic newsreels about Nazi crimes. Yet strangely enough, they withdrew them from the public domain shortly afterward.

The Diary of Anne Frank (1959) was the first postwar Hollywood film turning on the Holocaust, but it was devoid of Nazi horrors. Judgment at Nuremberg (1961), which was inspired by a television film of the same name released two years earlier, treated Nazism much less abstractly.

The Pawnbroker (1965), starring Rod Steiger, attempted to recreate life in a concentration camp. Though powerful, its impact on audiences was negligible compared to Holocaust, the 1978 nine-hour mini-series that unfolded through the eyes of an assimilated Jewish family in Germany.

One in every two American families watched Holocaust, but novelist Elie Wiesel claimed it trivialized Hitler's diabolical plan to exterminate European Jewry.

Be that as it may, Holocaust had an enormous effect, particularly in Germany. One wag joked that Holocaust had a more profound impact on Germans than the Shoah itself.

War and Remembrance, a 30-hour 1988 TV mini-series, was also unforgettable. But the film whose influence has been incalculable was Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List (1993), which sanctified a flawed German individual who saved more than 1,000 Jews in Nazi-occupied Poland.

Hollywood and the Holocaust, which is narrated by Gene Hackman and features interviews with, among others, Spielberg, ends at this juncture. Viewers with more than a passing interest in the Holocaust should not miss it.

YOUNG PRODUCER BRINGS LARSEN MUSICAL TICK TICK... BOOM! TO TORONTO

The play Rent became a huge international sensation soon after it previewed at the New York Theatre Workshop in January 1996. Regrettably, its vast success was of no benefit to 35-year-old playwright Jonathan Larson, who died suddenly after the last dress rehearsal the evening before. However, his legend lives on.

Mitchell Marcus, a young theatrical producer, is now preparing to bring an earlier Larson musical, tick, tick... BOOM! to Toronto for the first time. The production features three actors and a band performing 14 songs and the roles of 10 characters.

"tick, tick... BOOM! is a powerful and intimate look at facing a crossroads and holding onto dreams," said Marcus, a 22-year-old graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and a former program director for Young Judaea's Camp Biluim.

Marcus attained first Canadian rights to the Larson vehicle soon after mounting a small production of David French's Salt-Water Moon here in 2004. He also secured actor Dean Armstrong from Broadway's Rent and TV's Queer As Folk to take the leading role.

His new company, the Acting Up Stage Theatre Company, "is dedicated to producing intimate musical theatre productions... and cultivating a new generation of audiences through thought-provoking, contemporary works," he said.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 18. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office.

E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Please note: submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2005 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, March 4, 2005. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 11, 2005.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 24, 2005. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Jacques Israelievitch conducts at debut of Koffler Chamber Orchestra

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Jacques Israelievitch, concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, has joined with 23 amateur musicians from all walks of life to create a new orchestra.

Israelievitch says the process of finding the right musicians for the fledgling Koffler Centre Orchestra, which he conducts, was a challenge "because it's an orchestra that is not paid. But we were able to get a good group together. I'm quite happy."

Jacques Israelievitch

The orchestra will play a demanding program of works by J.S. Bach, C.P.E. Bach, Dvorak and Britten for its debut concert at Leah Posluns Theatre on Feb. 15 at 8:00 p.m., he says. Along with his conducting duties, Israelievitch performs in a J.S. Bach concerto that evening.

Israelievitch has appeared regularly with the TSO as a soloist and conductor. He became the assistant concertmaster of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at the age of 23 and has served as the concertmaster for the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. He has played chamber music with Emanuel Ax, Yefim Bronfman and Yo-Yo Ma.

Adrienne Cohen, director of Koffler School of Music, says each musician had to audition with Israelievitch in order to be accepted in the orchestra. "The wonderful thing about the musicians is they are high calibre."

Cohen, who oversees all aspects of education and programming at the Koffler School, adds that the musicians come from a variety of backgrounds. They include lawyers, doctors, entrepreneurs, and even a university professor, and range in age from 20 to 60.

"They joined this orchestra motivated to create beautiful and challenging music and be conducted by a master," she says. This is the first time in its history that the Koffler School of Music has had an in-house orchestra.

The call for string players attracted twice the number of applicants expected. Created in November, the orchestra is sponsored by Leslie Dan and family.

"The concert was created as a means to fundraise for the music school but also to give the school exposure in the community," Cohen says.

The Koffler School of Music offers music lessons for all ages in piano, violin, guitar, flute and other instruments.

For concert tickets, call 416-636-1880, ext. 269.

Young Thornhill actress shines in LKTYP's latest production

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

When Jessica Greenberg goes to work, she enters a world where everyone can fly, the sun never sets and the fun never ends.

Ah, the life of a theatre actor.

Greenberg, a Thornhill native who studied in the Circle in the Square Theatre School in New York City, is appearing in The Blue Planet, an Icelandic play that is making its English language premiere at the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People (LKTYP).

The play begins when an intergalactic salesman crashes into the planet inhabited only by children, teaches them to fly and nails the sun to the sky.

But in the process he inspires them to want more and introduces feelings like greed and competitiveness, which they never experienced before, says Greenberg.

After a competition, two kids accidentally fly to the other side of the planet where it's cold and dark and the sun never comes up.

While the underlying message teaches children about the repercussions of their actions, Greenberg says it is not as political as she is making it seem. "It is a fun play, with serious moments."

Greenberg who plays Elva, a little girl who is "a little bit bossy, and a little bit nasty," says that acting has always been in her blood, but it wasn't always her number one priority.

When she was 14, she was already an accomplished singer, dancer and actor, after having performed in amateur productions of Gypsy, and The Children's Hour, and majored in dance at Toronto's performing-arts high school, Earl Haig Secondary School.

But acting took a back seat to her education when she went off to study political science and women's studies at McGill University in Montreal.

By her third year, she could no longer ignore her calling and got serious about the art.

"I met a group of students in Montreal who were into acting and it was just so much fun. I love the connection you develop when you work closely with people, the bond, the family you create," she said.

Jessica Greenberg

Since then, she has appeared off-Broadway in New York, and in Jacob Two-Two Meets the Hooded Fang, in Toronto.

What the 20-something actress loves about acting is "the idea that you can make people laugh, you can make people cry, and give them a good experience."

Greenberg isn't the only one in her family who is passionate about the art of performance. Her mother is a trained singer and her father, a theatre professor at the University of Waterloo, is also an actor and writer.

While she says there is nothing she'd rather be doing, she admits that acting for a living is not as glamorous as some may think.

"The business element of it can be challenging. As an actor, you're always working, which may not be a bad thing, but it's always on my mind. I'm always thinking about the rehearsal that day or other opportunities," Greenberg says.

While she has no immediate plans once the production ends, she says she hopes there will be more opportunities to act in the future.

"I'd love to work in movies and television," she says. "I want to work in theatre as well. I want to do everything."

The Blue Planet runs until March 20 at the LKTYP. For tickets, call 416-862-2222. For schedules, on-line tickets, and ticket prices visit, www.lktyp.ca.

Chassidic reggae a hit in Toronto

By ERIN SILVER
Special to the CJN

He's a rather unorthodox phenom, but fans agree Matisyahu is completely kosher.

The chassidic Jewish rapper, beat boxer and burgeoning reggae superstar wowed his fans when he performed in Toronto recently, one of many stops he's making on his North American concert blitz to promote peace, his love for Judaism and his first album Shake off the Dust... Arise!

The album features 17 tracks Matisyahu describes as "rootsy" with "dancehall energy" and "punchy" lyrics about God, faith and the Torah.

His blend of Jewish spirituality and reggae has earned the 25-year-old hip-hop artist a loyal following among Jews in New York and beyond. His fan base particularly extends to the university and young professional crowd, who are impressed with and inspired by his message and the medium.

"I think his message is one of peace, and he shows his love for God and humanity through his music," says Jonathan Samuel, 24, who is a big Matisyahu fan and attended the Toronto concert.

"He is somewhat of a religious revolutionary in that his message is probably the same as many other religious Jews, but his reggae music sets him apart and attracts people who would not otherwise pay attention to the word of God."

The cultural experience Matisyahu provides is incredibly unique to Toronto listeners. "He's completely original," says Shawn Dym, who was so inspired by the music at the Toronto concert that at one point he joined Matisyahu on stage to dance.

"I've never seen anything like him before," he says.

Born Matthew Miller, Matisyahyu was raised in a non-religious family in White Plains, N.Y. He grew up on a musical diet of Phish and Bob Marley and began to create his own blend of reggae after high school, as a form of self-expression.

After a few years of soul-searching, he discovered Orthodox Judaism and eventually, a musical style he calls chassidic reggae, which, appropriately, is the URL for his website (www.hasidicreggae.com). The site features press clippings, concert tour dates, a biography and free samples of his music.

Matisyahu performs in a black hat, white shirt and black suit, and he never performs on Shabbat, carefully balancing his musical career and his religious obligations.

His lack of "bling bling" (flashy jewelry) is a novelty for fans used to music artists with lots of it, but, says Samuel, "after listening to how talented he really is, the true beauty of the music takes over and you like him because the music he puts out rocks."

MK condemns JAFI scholarship funded by Ottawa Jewish Council

By TAMARA TRAUBMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An MK wants Israel's attorney general to look into the legality of a scholarship for student terror victims that is funded by Ottawa's Jewish community, because she says its "racist criteria" make Arab applicants ineligible.

Only students who have served in the Israel Defence Forces or have completed some form of national service can apply for the Jewish Agency for Israel scholarship. As a result, only Jewish, not Arab, terror victims are entitled to the aid, says MK Zahava Gal-On of the left-wing Yahad party.

JAFI set up the fund two years ago, and so far it has offered university scholarships totalling nearly NIS 1 million.

"I am approaching you with a request to review whether the racist criteria for receiving the scholarship for student victims of terror constitute a breach of the law," Gal-On wrote last week to Attorney General Menachem Mazuz.

"Terror does not distinguish between Jews and Arabs... Criteria based on military service discriminate between blood and blood, such that an Arab Israeli citizen who is studying at university and whose family members were hurt in a terrorist attack on a bus is not entitled to receive a scholarship," Gal-On said.

Money for the scholarship comes from the Ottawa Fund, which operates in conjunction with United Israel Appeal Federations Canada and the Jewish Agency. Restricting the scholarship to students who have served in the military came at the request of the Ottawa Fund.

Mitchell Bellman, executive director of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa, explained that the community wanted "to donate to people who had contributed to the state and had fallen victim to terror."

A spokesperson for the Jewish Agency said the military service criteria "make no distinction between religion, race or gender." He added that of the 266 students who have received scholarships under the fund up to now, two have been Druze and one Bedouin.

Argentine Jews reel from attack

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine Jews have been shocked by one of the worst instances of anti-Semitic vandalism they have seen in some time and by the authorities' reaction to it.

On Jan. 29, swastikas and references to Auschwitz were daubed on the Israeli Center of Ramos Mejia in the western outskirts of Buenos Aires, and pamphlets were left denying the Holocaust.

Police caught two people in the act of writing on the walls, but quickly released the alleged perpetrators, who were described as members of the middle class from Buenos Aires.

The Jewish community's DAIA political umbrella organization issued a statement calling the authorities' conduct in the case "beyond bearing." They denounced it as a violation of Argentine laws against discrimination and asked that the two alleged perpetrators be punished harshly.

"We will fight against this. We are shocked; it's the biggest anti-Semitic event that ever happened here, but we will not stop until we sort this out," Eduardo Baliner, president of the Ramos Mejia center, told JTA.

"We even decided not to clean the walls immediately so neighbours can see and react."

The centre, which has 70 members, and some 250 people who attend its weekly activities, has been supportive of Israeli-Arab peace. Palestinian officials have even been invited to speak there.

"Argentines seem to be forgetful," Baliner said. "We had 30,000 missing people" during the military government in power from 1976 to 1983. "We had bombings of the Israeli Embassy and the AMIA Jewish central institution. How can we learn from our dramatic history?"

University investigating student complaint

The week highlighted the need for Zionist educational training for Jewish students, Shames said. Hillel had been planning two such programs already, "and now we see an even more pressing need."

U of T student Melissa Lantsman, who is involved in both Hillel and Betar-Tagar, the campus wing of Herut-Likud Canada, said weeks such as last week "that promote controversy are very difficult for one's Jewish identity on campus and one's desire to continue being an active member."

She said there is a "definite concern at how far free speech might go before it trickles into hate speech."

Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, said Hillel is satisfied that the university "took all measures to ensure that there was an appropriate discussion and a safe environment for IsraelFEST to continue."

David Farrar, U of T's deputy provost, said the fact "we could have such a politically charged debate on campus, and it didn't get out of control, is reassuring."

The university is investigating a complaint by a student regarding possible hate speech. Farrar said he would be meeting with university administration and with the student groups involved "to see how we can have these discussions in a way that's less politically charged, if that's possible.

"Freedom of speech is very important to us," he said.

Maccabi waterpolo team wins provincial tournament

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

The Maccabi waterpolo team came out on top in the 2005 Ontario Senior Circuit tournament last week and now they're off to Israel to take on the world.

Winning this tournament, however, was just a bonus, says team member Ari Lantos, as the team used this competition to help them train for the Maccabiah Games in Israel next July.

This win was promising, considering this was the first time the squad has come together this year to compete and assess how well they play together.

Almost 36 years ago, Lantos' father Robert played for a Montreal YMHA team at the games. The 1969 Canadian squad finished fourth.

This year, his son Ari, is confident they have a significantly stronger team and hopes they can, at least, win a medal.

"I like our chances," the 24-year-old says.

The fact that Ari is following in the footsteps of his father is no coincidence.

While Ari wasn't always into waterpolo, his father encouraged him to pick it up after he saw he had a lot of potential.

"He was the reason behind me getting into the sport. I was a competitive swimmer until I was 15, and I switched into the sport on my own accord," he says.

He explains that his interest in competitive swimming waned when he could no longer keep up with the fierce competition.

"My dad saw that [I was losing interest] and suggested I give waterpolo a try, and I picked it up very quickly."

Years later, Ari has honed his skills to become one of the team's best players.

The captain, 34-year-old Mitch Schipper, who has been with the team so long that he sometimes helps with coaching strategies, says, "In 20 years, there has never been a team as strong. I'm really excited about this team."

While he is confident that they will be a threat, he knows it will be no easy task for them to get past the best from countries like Australia, the United States, Brazil, South Africa and of course, Israel.

This optimism comes after an 8-6 win over Hamilton's waterpolo team, which is fourth best in Canada.

Schipper says it was a good win because Hamilton, having played in the Canadian Senior League, is a strong group.

Ari agrees, and says by beating them it shows they are not just the best Jewish team, but one of the elite rosters in Canada.

"We came out very strong and didn't let up," Schipper says. "We took a commanding lead after the second quarter.

"It was good to see the team come together," he says, some of whom have only been playing with Maccabi for a year.

"Mike Gordon, Ari Lantos, Marshall Young, Igor Sapohznikov and Jeff Sinsofsky each played outstanding in the final game," he says.

Canada's Maccabi waterpolo team hopes to make a splash at this summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

With that game behind them, the focus has shifted to the Maccabiah Games, and getting past the power teams like the United States and Israel.

Ari also hopes the competition will have a better turnout than it did when he competed with the Canadian team and won a bronze medal at the Maccabiah Games in 2001.

"When I went four years ago, it was different because of the intifadah. Other teams bailed out because they were scared. Israel had to enter two teams just to keep the tournament going," he says.

For Ari, going to this competition is also important on a political level. "For us, as it was four years ago, it's important to go to Israel to give support and to show the rest of the world that we're behind [Israel]."

He hopes this year things will be different, that none of the eight teams will back out and it'll be the biggest competition they've had.

Until then, the team will be training hard – up to four times a week, Schipper says – and will be travelling to the United States to compete in preparation for the Maccabiah Games.

Israeli hoops squad takes first in Euroleague division

By ARI LIVNAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Maccabi Tel Aviv beat Olympija Ljubljana 95-82 at Yad Eliahu last week, avenging a 93-81 loss in Slovenia on Dec. 9 and ensuring that the reigning Euroleague champion will finish in first place in Group B.

Olympija led the game until the half, scoring a high percentage of shots from three-point range, but Maccabi woke up in the second half, took the lead and never looked back.

Anthony Parker was MVP for Tel Aviv, finishing with 22 points, while Maseo Baston scored 16. Deon Thomas and Derrick Sharp also had strong games. "What's special about Maccabi is the chemistry between the players. We're a family, both on and off the court," Sharp said.

Maccabi's Israeli players didn't contribute much to the win, scoring only four points between them.

"The Israeli teams need to learn from Ljubljana that it's possible to compete with us even with a smaller budget. Their budget is about 4 million euros, but it's a young, well-coached team with good fundamentals. They tried to catch us in places where we weren't prepared. They did," Maccabi coach Pini Gershon said after the game.

Maccabi may finish the season in the red because the Euroleague owes the club more than $1 million (all figures US). Maccabi's management denied that the league owes the club money, but sources close to the team say the debt goes back to last season.

The funds represent a significant part of Maccabi's $11.5 million annual budget. The club had a loss of some $500,000 last season.

Raptors, Maccabi Tel Aviv may tangle in pre-season

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

A European basketball website is reporting that the Toronto Raptors will play host to four-time Euroleague champion Maccabi Tel Aviv in one of its pre-season contests at Air Canada Centre in October.

Raptors officials say the game in Toronto has yet to be formalized, but confirmed that negotiations have been held between the two sides.

"We're still in discussions at this point," said Steve Fruitman, the Raptors' director of basketball operations. "We hope to know before the summer."

The European website, 24sec.net, reported that the game is on after a meeting in New York last month between the Israeli consul and NBA Commissioner David Stern. Maccabi is also hoping to tip off against the New Jersey Nets and the Miami Heat during its North American trip next fall.

One of Miami's owners, Raanan Katz, co-owns Maccabi. The Heat played at the Yad Eliyahu Sports Palace in October 1999, becoming the fifth NBA team to play Maccabi in Tel Aviv.

In addition to winning its 44th Israeli championship in 2004, Maccabi Tel-Aviv also captured the Euroleague and Israeli Cup titles. The club hosted the European Final Four in Tel Aviv last May, beating Skipper Bologna 118-74 in the championship game.

The Raptors have a history of hosting European professional teams, playing Italian club Benetton Treviso last fall and Panathinaikos of the Greek League in 2003.

Is Valentine's Day staged bliss?

The world is coming to an end.

I was out for lunch with a girlfriend when we came across cute, sparkly pink heart-shaped cookies being sold in honour of Valentines Day. Instead of the mush and gush that usually spewed out of our mouths whenever we crossed something pink, all I heard was "Oh my gosh, I think I'm gonna toss my cookies."

By SANDIE BENITAH

I was shocked. This was coming from the same girl who still dotted her i's with hearts.

"It's too commercial," she said. "It's like a scheduled romance – not very romantic at all."

But maybe, whether we're single or involved, a scheduled reminder of the importance of love isn't such a bad thing.

While we all would like to believe every day should be Valentine's Day, the truth is that couldn't be further from the truth. Even though I'm sure relationships are filled with nice gestures, it's not every day that couples go out of their way to be selfless and think only about ways to make their honey feel special and loved. That's what this holiday should be about.

I've seen couples, both old and new, fall into the routine commercial trap – lovely card followed by a candlelight dinner and then a box of chocolates for dessert. Gross. No wonder my friend was nauseous at the thought of Feb. 14.

At first glance, it does seem as if this holiday is providing couples with a formula for a staged evening of romance and bliss, but just like everything else in life, this holiday is what you make of it. If Valentine's Day is a day for love, doesn't the occasion deserve us to think outside the boxed chocolate? Even if it's just something simple, such as letting him watch Trailer Park Boys reruns or giving in to her endless request to go salsa dancing, the point is to have a thought that doesn't reek of Hallmark, but instead shows that you've put a little thought into celebrating the special relationships in your life.

And I mean all relationships.

Valentine's Day always reminds me of my mom because she's always made sure I felt extra special on this day. No matter what was going on in my personal life, I knew that on Feb. 14, my mom would always come through for me, with sweet notes and special trinkets to let me know that I was indeed the love of her life.

I also can't forget the one year my friends and I treated one another to huge ice cream sundaes and a great night on the town. I love my friends and this holiday is meant for all of those we love.

Sure, like all holidays, this one has become "Hallmarked" to death, but I can't help it – each time I walk by a heart-filled, frilly pink window display, I can't help but feel warm and fuzzy inside and I challenge anybody who says they don't feel the same.

If Valentine's Day happened to fall on the same day as Super Bowl Sunday, would my friend still be comfortable calling the day meaningless? Or would she be calling me complaining about her beau's request to spend the day with his friends? She and I both know the answer to that one.

Last night, I stopped at a coffee shop on my way out and saw once again those heart-shaped cookies. This time, I bought one for my boyfriend and ironically enough, even though it looked pretty on the outside, it did taste kind of gross on the inside. Some might take that as a metaphor, but I assure you, there was nothing gross about the warm smile and hug I received in exchange for my little surprise.

CHICKEN HAWAII

- 1 chicken, cut in 8ths
- 1 tblsp flour
- 2 tsp salt
- pinch white pepper
- 4 tblsp oil

SAUCE:

- 1 can crushed pineapple
- 2 tsp soy sauce
- 1/2 lg onion, sliced
- 1 lg green pepper, cut in thin strips
- 2 tsp brown sugar
- 2 tsp cornstarch mixed with 2 tblsp chicken stock

Shake chicken pieces with seasoned flour in a bag to coat. Saute in oil until brown on all sides in a large pan. Transfer to a casserole and cook covered 45 min. at 350°F.

Meanwhile make the sauce in the same pan. Saute onion and pepper strips about 5 min. and add remaining ingredients. Simmer 3 min. until thick and clear and pour over chicken in casserole. Cook 10 min. more until tender.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I'm worried about my parents. Throughout my life, they seemed to have had a reasonable marriage. They worked out problems together, went on trips, played cards each week, etc. It appeared that everything was fine between them.

Recently my father retired after working in the same position for more than 35 years. My mother was always a stay-at-home housewife and was used to her space. Now every time I go to see my parents, they are at war. They shout and argue about everything regardless of how insignificant it is. They seem to despise each other. You can actually see the hatred in my mother's eyes when my father walks into the room. I've tried talking to her, but she says, "I don't want to hear anything about your father," then she gets up and leaves. There is something very wrong here. Do you have any suggestions?

War Zone

Dear War Zone

There is no question that the dynamics of a marriage change when a spouse retires. Many things come into play. Your dad may feel displaced. He has had a routine for most of his life, and now that is gone. He served a purpose at work and that is gone, too.

Your mother, on the other hand, was the queen of her domain. Now she has an invader. Being together with a spouse 24/7 without resentment and arguing is next to impossible without help and adjustment. If your dad is well, he needs to create a new routine for himself. There are various groups and activities that he can take part in.

This is where you come in. Do the research and help him get integrated into a new routine. He is not alone. There are many people in his shoes.

Once his life regains purpose and he is not underfoot anymore, your mother's issues will fall away naturally. She also has adjusting to do, and without your father constantly around, she will have some of her privacy back. If their marriage was strong before, it will survive this. There are major adjustments to be made, but they are attainable goals.

Life: a collage of questions

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

This column is about nothing. It is just about life.

I wish I could, at least for a gentle moment, crawl inside someone else's mind to see life through his or her filters and determine if we all live in the same reality. Is my yellow the same as yours? What do you think about most of the time? How deep is your love for your spouse and family? How does love feel to you? Do you feel blessed when you walk through the door and are accosted, lovingly, by demands and endless questions from your family?

URBAN WRITER

For those who are single, how quiet are your nights? Do you wish you were the person in the above paragraph, flooded with familial clamour? You, the family person who has little time for personal development, are you envious of those who can hear the ticking of an inexpensive clock on their wall as the night sets in?

What is it like to see me walking in a crowd? I can't see myself like you can, from the outside in, because my self-image is blurred by a lifelong focus on a vision of myself that comes from the inside out, and a noise defining, and redefining, who I think I am. Do you wonder how you appear to others? How you sound? What we think about you?

I wish I could, for an instant, understand your empathy and view of our world. I see more suffering in our world than joy. Do you? As I get older, more children seem to be dying, funerals are daily occurrences and I regularly tiptoe around cancerous raindrops, which have so far missed me by a minute and an inch. Why does happiness last a moment, yet sorrow spends the day? Do you see things this way?

Do you know when you are wrong? Sometimes I think I am wrong about our ability to achieve peace in the world. I fear this when meanness grabs me by the head, stares at me, and holds on tight. Did you know a Sudanese slave owner macheted a child's arms off for crying for her mother? Who is this guy? How many men and women are crammed with such ugliness? If they can do this to a child, can evil be squeezed out of them? Can it be squeezed from our world?

Does this evil really lie dormant inside you until hunger, power or hatred disrupts its slumber? I sometimes feel nauseous and humiliated about being human and praise God for making life short. Do you? The machete horror really happened to a child. We were children. I think I could beat this man and sob the entire time. Would you?

Even after years of public speaking and hosting radio and television shows, I frequently get very nervous and feel like running away when standing in front of a crowd. I have a lot of insecurities – not really about my message and mission, but more so about me as the messenger. Are you insecure? You don't look it. You look so perfect and well put together. Are you?

I wish that our community, our world, would hide less. Isn't it worthwhile letting others know that we fear knowing, and that we fear not knowing even more; that we often cramp from loneliness? Should we not expose our adoration, throw open the barn doors and tell others that we would live and die for them and that our love for them is bigger and warmer than the sun?

This is a column about nothing. It's just a column about life.

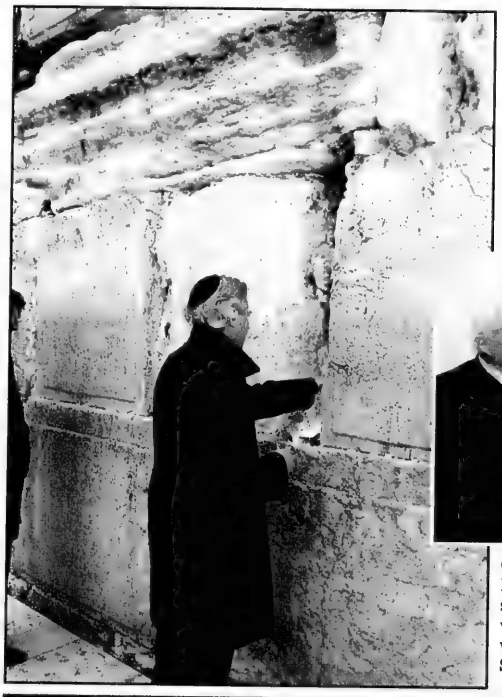
Pettigrew pledges unique Mideast role



Canadian Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew places a note between the stones of the Western Wall during his visit last week to Israel. Above, he meets with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. [Canadian Embassy, Isranet photos]

Senses 'fundamental change' in region

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

"Cautious optimism" is how Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew assessed the mood in the Middle East as he ended his six-day trip through the region.

In an e-mail interview with The CJN from Syria – his final stop after visits to Jordan, Israel, the Palestinian territories and Lebanon – the minister said that "people were positive and hopeful. They remain realistic, however, and recognize that there could be setbacks and that we are still at an early moment.

"There is a sense of fundamental change in the atmosphere, in the actions of all parties and in the possibilities for the future. Israeli and Palestinian ministers and officials are in constant contact and dialogue across a range of issues – from prisoner release to security co-operation.

"As well, they are co-ordinating Israel's withdrawal from Gaza and the north West Bank. Other countries – in the region and beyond – also seem committed to ensuring that Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and [Israeli] Prime Minister Ariel Sharon are provided with every opportunity to succeed in making the most of this opportunity."

Pettigrew met Sharon for an hour last Thursday and said he commended Sharon for his decision to withdraw from Gaza and parts of the northern West Bank – with a proviso.

"I also made clear that, for Canada, this is only a first step. We look forward to a return to negotiations on final status issues, including borders.

Violence against British Jews hits record high

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Violent anti-Semitic attacks in Britain have reached "alarming" record levels, according to a report released last week, prompting calls by Jewish leaders for more to be done to protect their community.

The Community Safety Trust (CST), which represents Britain's 290,000-strong Jewish community on security matters, said that in 2004, there had been 532 "anti-Semitic incidents" – defined as malicious acts toward Jews – including a record 83 assaults.

The total, which included abuse and threats, rose by 42 per cent from the CST's 2003 figure, and well above the previous record high of 405 incidents in 2000.

"This increase is extremely alarming. The transfer of tensions in the Middle East to the streets of Britain has resulted in an unprecedented level of anti-Semitic incidents," said Michael Whine, director of communications for the CST.

The trust said 100 incidents were reported in March 2004 alone. In the worst incident, a Jewish teenager had his jaw shattered in the English south coast city of Southampton. Last month, London police said they were hunting a group of black and Asian men said to be behind a string of racist attacks on Orthodox Jewish men in the capital.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Too Late to Sue Liz?

TORONTO — A California judge last week threw out a claim by a Hamilton, Ont., man and his family to an 1889 Van Gogh painting owned by Elizabeth Taylor that he says his grandmother was forced to give up before fleeing Nazi Germany. The suit was filed under the 1998 U.S. Holocaust Victims Redress Act, but Judge Gary Klausner said state law only gives plaintiffs three years to sue after property is taken. Taylor contends that View of the Asylum and Chapel at Saint-Remy, which is worth at least $10 million (US), legitimately changed hands after the war and that her father bought it for her in good faith in 1963. Lawyers for Andrew Orkin and three South African relatives said an appeal is likely.

WORLD

Katsav Can't Visit N.Z.

WELLINGTON — Prime Minister Helen Clark said Israeli President Moshe Katsav can't visit New Zealand when he travels to Australia next month, because of a passport fraud case involving suspected Mossad spies. Relations between Israel and New Zealand were strained after the conviction last year of two men who tried to illegally obtain a New Zealand passport. Clark says the men, who pleaded guilty and served half of a six-month jail term before being deported, are Israeli agents. Last week, Ha'aretz reported that Amir Lati, a diplomat in Israel's embassy in Australia who visited the men in prison, was asked by the Australian government in December to leave the country or face deportation for alleged espionage and sexual harassment.

Family Sues Poland

PARIS — A Jewish family whose business was seized by Communist Poland is suing the Polish government for compensation in the European Court of Human Rights. The suit was filed by the Pikielny family, whose textile firm in Lodz was seized by the Nazis. Family members returned to Lodz after the war, but the factory was nationalized by the state. Henry Pikielny, 76, who lives in Paris, said he hopes the court will force Poland to enact laws to deal with such cases.

Museum All Farklempt

CLEVELAND — The Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and Museum has filed suit to stop Washington Post reporter David Segal, New Yorker writer Jeff Goldberg and radio executive Allen Goldberg from launching a non-profit website called the Jewish Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Saying the site would infringe on its trademark and confuse the public, the museum wants more than $100,000 in damages. Said Jeff Goldberg, "I don't think they own rock and roll and I don't think they own the phrase 'Hall of Fame' and I know for sure they don't own the Jews."

Resort May Re-open

PARIS — The Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC) is protesting plans by InterContinental Hotels to re-open a Nazi resort. The hotel chain's magazine called Hitler's Bavarian Alps retreat near Berchtesgaden a "cozy spot for a display of thigh-slapping local dancing" and plans to open a resort there next month, Ha'aretz reported. The site is "where Adolf Hitler… and the Nazi leadership took most of the decisions that cost the world 70 million lives," the SWC told the chain.

Arthur Miller Dies

NEW YORK — Pulitzer-Prize winning playwright Arthur Miller died last week at age 89. Miller was best known for Death of a Salesman, which won the Pulitzer Prize in 1949, and for the 1953 Tony-Award winning play The Crucible. Miller, who died at his Connecticut home, was married to actress Marilyn Monroe for five years.

Supporters Rally for Zundel

EDMONTON — About a dozen supporters of Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel rallied in front of Deputy Prime Minister Anne McLellan's Edmonton constituency office to mark his two years in a Toronto jail on immigration charges.

The Feb. 6 rally was led by Paul Fromm, director of the Canadian Association for Free Expression and a teacher who was fired by an Ontario school board in 1997 for allegedly fraternizing with white supremacists and neo-Nazis in his free time. McLellan's portfolio includes border security.

Zundel, 65, is facing deportation to his native Germany under a certificate that calls him a threat to national security. He had lived in Canada for 42 years and was jailed in January 2003 after being deported from the United States for alleged immigration violations. If returned to Germany, he faces prosecution as a neo-Nazi and Holocaust denier.

On Feb. 5 in Los Angeles, about 20 people protested in front of the Canadian consulate to demand Zundel's release in a rally held by the Institute for Historical Review, a Holocaust-denial group. They were met by 45 Jewish Defence League adherents. Separated by police, the groups exchanged shouts and insults for an hour without incident. Protesters at both events called Zundel a political prisoner.

Rosenzweig's killer to be sentenced this week

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Christopher McBride was angry as he left the King David pizzeria on Bathurst Street south of Lawrence Avenue, furious that he couldn't find the young men who'd earlier taunted him about a drug deal.

They'd sent him on a wild goose chase to a nearby service station, and when he couldn't find the marijuana he was looking for, he returned to a nearby apartment where he was staying, retrieved a kitchen knife and set out looking for revenge.

Setting out the chain of events on the evening of July 13-14, 2002, that would ultimately claim the life of David Rosenzweig, Crown prosecutor Andrew Locke recounted how McBride headed back to the restaurant, with his girlfriend and a buddy pleading with him not to do anything rash.

Drunk and belligerent, McBride would not be stopped. He barged through the restaurant, asking customers if they were the ones who had toyed with him. During that brief period, he was heard to say something along the lines of "fucking Jews" or "motherfucking Jews," Locke told court last week, reading from an agreed statement of facts.

David Rosenzweig

McBride was ushered out of the restaurant, but not before an altercation with an employee during which he swung the knife, grazing him.

As he walked south along Bathurst, he came across Rosenzweig, a father of six who was waiting with his son Ezra for a tow truck. McBride, who had consumed two 40-ounce bottles of malt liquor (a high-alcohol beer) earlier in the evening, waved his hands in the air, yelled something incomprehensible and slammed a knife into Rosenzweig's back, cutting into his aorta. Rosenzweig, 49, died shortly afterward.

Last week, McBride, 22, pleaded guilty to second degree murder. He had been charged with first degree murder, but the Crown and defence lawyer Jeff Shulman agreed to reduce the charge in exchange for a guilty plea.

The offence carries an automatic life sentence, but the presiding judge can determine when McBride is eligible for parole. The minimum jail term before parole is 10 years. Hate motivation can be a factor in sentencing and Crown attorney Fred Braley told reporters after last week's hearing that "religious or racial elements" played a role in the crime.

Reading the agreed statement of facts, Locke laid the groundwork for a claim that prejudice was a factor in the murder. He said that on the night of the murder, the area was teeming with visibly observant Jews.

The King David and J-One restaurants were popular spots for Jewish youth to gather after the Sabbath. People milled about on the street and the restaurant was often crowded. Many in the crowd sported the distinctive appearance of Orthodox Jews, Locke said, with white shirts, dark jackets and skullcaps.

There was no trial, as we were all expecting. Instead, there was a guilty plea from Christopher McBride, the man who took David Rosenzweig's life.

For those of you who have sat in a courtroom and heard the minutest of details about the final moments of a loved one's life, you'll understand our family's relief at learning we were free of the emotional ball and chain that a trial manacles to your soul.

The chore of tolerance

From the editor's desk

A conversation with Pierre Lasry, in some sense, is like an immersion into an encyclopedia. The Montreal writer and documentary filmmaker has a mind whose thoughts traverse a wide range of disciplines and interests.

I met with Lasry recently in Montreal for a brief cup of coffee. I was following up on a telephone conversation I had with him the month before.

My introduction to Lasry, however, was more than two and a half years ago, when I read Esther, A Jewish Odyssey, his imaginary depiction of the remarkable story of Esther Brandao, who is reputed to be the first Jew to arrive in Canada.

The book, reviewed in this space on Feb. 20, 2003, was captivating. It held me like a tightly fastened vise, gripping my attention from its first page and never letting go. (The original, French-language version of the book, Une Juive en Nouvelle-France, won the prestigious J.I. Segal Prix de la Litterature Francaise).

But much of Lasry's work is that way. He challenges the reader or viewer with fresh, compelling ideas. He forces us to think about our own identity, how we became who we are and whether we could be more.

The work that preceded the publication of Esther was his feature film for the National Film Board of Canada (NFB), Shylock, an historic and cultural exploration of the famous and infamous Shakespearean character in The Merchant of Venice. The film was nominated for a Gemini Award and is an important educational instrument for anyone who seeks a better, fuller understanding of the origin and significance of the Shylock archetype in modern western culture.

Lasry spent some 27 years making films for the NFB. The breadth of their subject matter is a reflection of the wide range of his curious mind.

His training for making films came early on in his life and from the masters. Four years after he arrived in Montreal from Morocco, a young man in his late teens, he was in New York City studying film and film production techniques at New York City College.

He then continued with his studies at Lee Strassberg's Actors Studio and assisted Stanley Kubrick in making Dr. Strangelove and in 2001, A Space Odyssey. He co-wrote, produced and edited his first feature film, The Drifter, when he was 22 years old. It was sufficiently hailed as an artistic success that he and the film were invited to Canada by former minister of state Judy Lamarsh to attend Expo '67.

He left the NFB and filmmaking some 38 years later. The autodidact then channelled his intellectual stirrings and considerable writing and research skills into writing. Une Juive en Nouvelle-France was his first book.

Pierre Lasry

The narrative in the story of Esther Brandao takes the reader on the young woman's voyage and ensuing adventure in New France in 1738. But, like the ship that carried her across the ocean, the mere narrative aspect of the story sails only on the surface of the water. There is much more purpose in Lasry's retelling of the story below the surface, in the oceanic depths of Jewish history, identity, culture and survival. He plumbs those depths in the manner that has become his trademark: boldly.

Brandao was a new Christian, a Jew from the ghetto of Bayonne in France. She was a Marrano, who, even after a year of interrogation by church authorities in Quebec City, refused to abandon the faith and traditions of her ancestors.

But for Lasry, Marrano, a term of derision meaning "pig" in Castilian Spanish, has far-reaching allegorical significance for Jews and, indeed, humanity.

In a presentation he gave last November, Lasry said that "Marranos are the most ancient manifestation of the crossing between the Jewish culture and the culture of exile..."

Lasry considers Abraham, our patriarch, like many other giants throughout Jewish history, to have been an archetypical Marrano.

"What defines this Marrano... is that he is torn between two cultures. That of his own human conscience and the other, the culture he is fleeing from... what also defines this Marrano is his attempt to create a new reality in a new milieu."

That is why Lasry told the story of Esther Brandao. Her refusal "to convert to Christianity in order to stay in French Canada, remains an inspiration to all of us." By writing the book, Lasry ties Brandao's courage and resolve to that of the original Marrano – Abraham.

"Abraham understood that in order to survive, humanity must change its own murderous ways, by conditioning itself to patience and tolerance. That's the daily chore of the Jews."

It is clear that Lasry has undertaken that chore very personally. And the piercing challenge of his ideas is how he does so. —MBD

Beslan kids fortunate to survive terrorist attack

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Tamuraz Kesaev was asleep on the floor when the first explosion rocked the school auditorium. Crammed into tight quarters with hundreds of fellow students, he awoke in a panic and joined his 10-year-old brother, Samurbek, in a stampede out of the building. As they ran, Samurbek was cut down by gunfire from behind. Intent on murdering as many innocents as possible, terrorists sprayed a hail of bullets at the youngsters as they fled. Two bullets hit Samurbek, wounding both knees.

Tamuraz, a stocky 14-year-old who likes to wrestle, told his harrowing story last week following a news conference that introduced a group of 18 student survivors of the Beslan school siege. The youngsters are in Canada for a two-week visit that is part of an effort to help them recover from their ordeal.

On Sept. 1, 2004, Chechen and Ingush terrorists took more than 1,000 students hostage in the south Russian city of Beslan on the opening day of the school year.

The incident culminated four days later when terrorists set off bombs in a school auditorium where the students and their families had been gathered. Russian special forces then stormed the school. More than 350 hostages were killed; many were wounded.

In their panic to flee, Tamuraz and Samurbek were separated from their mother, Larissa. She had attended the opening day of the school year, as is the custom in Beslan, and had been reunited with her two sons in the school auditorium during the siege.

All through that day Tamuraz and Samurbek assumed she was dead. It was only later in the afternoon they learned she was alive, though her neck had been broken by the concussion of the explosion.

Today, Tamuraz can count himself and his family lucky to have escaped the fiendish plans of their captors. All are on the mend and Tamuraz has the wounds to prove his fortunate escape from death. Underneath his left sleeve are a number of pinkish scars marking the places where hot shrapnel tore into his flesh.

When the first bomb went off, Tamuraz was asleep on his back, with his left arm pulled up over his eyes, shielding his face.

Had he chosen another way to sleep, he might not be in Toronto to tell his story.

The youngsters were all, to some extent, wounded in the terrorist attack, said Boris Kantemirov, chaperone for the group.

Kantemirov was one of the many Beslan residents who rushed to the school when news of the siege was announced. As it turned out, his nephew and sister-in-law were being held in the school auditorium, directly beneath a bomb that was suspended by wires in the air.

Kantemirov, manager of a sports centre and a karate teacher, said that miraculously, they survived. When the bomb went off, the blast was directed outward, not down.

As his sister-in-law, Marina, described the incident, she was temporarily blinded by the blast. When her sight returned, she saw a mass of dead bodies around her. Though her legs were burned, she took her son and "threw him out a window" but he refused to run away, Kantemirov recounted, saying "Mama, I'll wait for you."

Thankfully, both recovered, he said.

Kantemirov said the incident will no doubt "stay deep in the brain" of those who experienced it. "It's a long way, step by step, to change and be normal."

Kantemirov believes the incident made the group he's with grow up quickly. The trip to Toronto – one of many such visits being offered Beslan kids across Europe and the United States – will help them cope with their experiences, he said.

The Russian Speaking Congress of Canada, which represents an estimated 250,000 Russian speakers in the Greater Toronto Area, organized the visit in cooperation with the Ossetian Association, Alanya.

The youngsters' itinerary includes a trip to Niagara Falls, Ottawa, Montreal and various spots in Toronto.

STORY TIME: Barbara Budd, an actress and host of CBC Radio's As it Happens, delighted Bialik Hebrew Day School students from junior kindergarten to Grade 5 recently with her reading of Bone Button Borscht, accompanied by classical and klezmer music. She visited the school as part of Bialik's reading month in support of the MS Read-a-thon. Pictured with Budd, are, from left, Josh Wintraub, Kyle Ludmer, Arielle Strasser and Jordana Charendoff.

Congress says it's modernizing advocacy function

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Same names, different titles?

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) recently announced an internal shift of personnel that it says goes beyond the cosmetic and is intended to strengthen and modernize the organization's advocacy functions nationwide.

The moves are consistent with the policy promoted by the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, an organization funded by local Jewish federations across the country, whose mandate is to streamline and improve the effectiveness of advocacy organizations and advance the Jewish community's position on domestic issues and those related to Israel.

Bernie Farber, formerly executive director of Congress' Ontario region, has been named national CEO of Congress, while Manuel Prutschi moves to national executive vice-president from his position as national director of community relations.

Len Rudner temporarily assumes Prutschi's community relations duties, along with his role as Ontario director of community relations.

At the same time, Congress announced that it's planning to hire two full-time lobbyists – one based in Ottawa, the other at Queen's Park – and that it has let go three back office accounting personnel.

Farber, who has been with Congress since 1984, said the moves are consistent with the revamping of community organizations under CIJA's direction. "We're in a time of marketing of ideas and advocacy and getting the message to Canadians out there. That's the skill set I've been working at all my life and I bring that skill set to the new position."

Farber said that as executive director of the Ontario region, one of his goals was "to ensure that CJC Ontario maintained its position as the pre-eminent advocacy voice for Ontario Jewry. As CEO, I will take that successful working formula for Ontario and translate it across the country."

Farber added that Congress will put forward the Jewish position on domestic issues and on international issues that don't involve Israel to Canadian politicians. (Under the CIJA umbrella, speaking on Israel-related issues is a task for the Canada-Israel Committee.)

Lobbyists to be hired

As CEO, Farber will have administration and governance responsibilities, but he will also be heavily involved in "reshaping the national vision for Jewish advocacy."

A native of Ottawa, Farber said he will rely on the input of Congress' volunteers and lay leadership to "energize" the organization's base. He said he expected that by tightening up the administration of the organization and by working regularly with the regions, Congress' message will be clear and consistent.

Farber predicted better co-ordination with other advocacy organizations, including CIC and those on campus. As the distinctions between anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism have receded, organizations that have addressed only one of these issues in the past must develop a more unified voice, he said.

Farber said his priorities include ensuring the security of the community from anti-Semitic attacks; bringing a positive message about Jewry to Canadians; and working with partners to educate Canadians about the links between anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism.

Prutschi, who has also been with Congress since 1984, will focus on developing policy, identifying issues of concern, promoting inter-group relations, conducting research and analysis and advising the organization's lay and professional leadership.

In his earlier capacities at Congress, he was also involved in policy formulation, but now "it will be at a broader level… they don't call me the professor for nothing," he said.

"Overall, the way we see Congress, its responsibility is to create a positive outside environment so the Jewish community internally can be vibrant and thriving. At the same time, [it should] act in the broader society that is reflective of Jewish values and Jewish aspirations."

Prutschi said the position of Canadian Jews can be made more secure if Canada adopts the Berlin Declaration of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), which set out a number of steps member states can undertake to address anti-Semitism.

Canada can also take a leading role at the United Nations by agreeing to support a stand-alone resolution condemning anti-Semitism, he said.

On the domestic front, Congress will, with government financial support, host three conferences on promoting civil domestic discourse.

Prutschi and Farber pointed to a major Congress initiative originating in its Pacific region that will urge the government to take a leading role in addressing the situation in Darfur, Sudan.

Congress president Ed Morgan said the new alignment at Congress allows the skills of Prutschi and Farber to complement each other. Farber, he said, is excellent at media relations and personnel management, while Prutschi "is the single most knowledgeable policy person on Jewish issues in Canada. He's our one-man think tank."

Morgan said UIA Federations will perform the accounting work once done in-house by Congress, allowing the organization to focus on advocacy.

Congress has an adequate budget to perform the tasks assigned to it, he said, discounting suggestions that with Congress's senior professional staff, as well as the president, located in Toronto, the organization would become Toronto-centric.

He pointed to important contributions from offices and staff in British Columbia and Quebec and suggested, "we are increasingly a seamless cloth, the regional and national Congress."

With modern telecommunications, consulting with the regions is simple, Morgan said, adding Congress will remain open to input from all areas, particularly when it is clear local sensitivities must be taken into account.

More than a Sabbath slogan

Last week on the downtown campus of the University of Toronto, the Arab Student Collective (ASC), a collection of like-minded propagandists, staged a calumnious theatre of anti-Israel vilification under the provocative title Israeli Apartheid Week. The week-long program had many aims, one of which was to try to upstage IsraelFEST 2005, the annual celebration of Israeli cultural and artistic diversity organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Apartheid Week failed utterly in detracting from the more honest and thus more powerful, positive message of IsraelFEST. The meagre attendance at Apartheid Week's culminating protest march last Friday was eloquent proof of the widespread disdain felt by the majority of the campus community for ASC's harshly polemical tactics.

Not surprisingly, however, Apartheid Week did spark considerable anger within the Jewish and wider communities. After all, its phony message was an affront to truth and an attack against the sensibilities of many of Israel's supporters.

That anger, in turn, caused many individuals and a variety of organizations within the community to mobilize in defence of Israel and what we can properly call, the integrity of truth. Rabbis and other leaders spoke from their pulpits. E-mail listservs clicked into action. And counter-demonstrators marched as wary monitors. Such varied and determined mobilization is a source of communal strength.

But in our zealousness to defend what we must always defend, some of us did so inappropriately. Because of tactical differences and differing approaches among communal organizations to responding to the Apartheid Week propagandists, some of us heaped public scorn on fellow Jews. Some of us pointed accusatory fingers at other Jewish groups rather than extend to them a hand in united, common cause,

The fight in defence of Israel and Jewish rights must be grounded in Jewish values. One of those core values is the cherished ideal of fellowship and responsibility one for the other.

To cite but two examples from among the countless many in our liturgy and wisdom literature where this sense of responsibility is extolled, each month we bless the arrival of the new moon by openly proclaiming chaverim kol Yisrael, all Israel is one fellowship. Similarly, the blessing chanted by the Kohanim before they invoke the traditional priestly benedictions literally requires them to perform the ancient rite with love for all Israel. No differentiations within the community are countenanced.

If our prayers and proclamations are to be more than mere Sabbath slogans, they must be manifest deep in the soul of our intra-communal behaviour.

Some readers might say that by writing about the turning of one Jewish group upon another, this editorial is guilty of the very behaviour it abjures. The point here, however, is not to fault the individuals but rather to fault the behaviour.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Darfur

Kol hakavod on your call to action in the Feb. 10 editorial on Darfur. The Jewish community's leadership has prioritized the protection of Darfur's civilian population as a key advocacy issue.

Your readers should know that their e-mails and telephone calls to the prime minister and their members of Parliament, as well as urgently needed synagogue initiatives, are part of a larger collective attempt to ensure Darfur does not become another Rwanda.

Before the last federal election, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) first raised the issue of Darfur with former prime minister Jean Chrétien, former foreign affairs minister Bill Graham and Senator Mobina Jaffer, Canada's special envoy to the Sudan peace process. Last month, on the eve of the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, CJC wrote to Prime Minister Paul Martin, calling upon the government of Canada to once again mobilize all necessary resources to prevent a greater catastrophe.

This past summer, CJC Quebec region helped organize a Darfur day of conscience, and in November, Darfur was raised as an issue with MPs during the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) democracy in action event in Ottawa. In Winnipeg, the Jewish federation has been working with the Sudan Rehabilitation and Relief Program. In Ontario region, CJC and KAIROS, a coalition of 10 churches, co-chaired a large rally in November at Queen's Park to bring attention to the Darfur tragedy. In British Columbia, CJC Pacific region (CJCPR) initiated city-wide addresses on the Darfur crisis in Vancouver synagogues on Yom Kippur.

At a recent CJCPR press conference, a Buchenwald survivor said that now is the time to "scream" about what is happening in Darfur. It is our fervent hope that more screams will be heard from the Jewish and other faith communities throughout the world before it is too late.

CJC, with the support of federations and CIJA, intends to press this issue until we are satisfied that all possible efforts have been expended.

More to frat boys than beer and parties

It should please you to know that the largest fraternity in Canada is 100 per cent Jewish. The 96 boys of Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPI) at the University of Western Ontario are not a clique of binge drinkers and couch potatoes. These fraternity brothers dedicate themselves to multiple philanthropic causes every year, and 2005 is no different.

During the upcoming UWO reading week, AEPI is teaming up with Birthright and Canada-Israel Experience to send a bus of frat boys to Israel for the second straight year. While in Israel, AEPI plans to visit Magen David Adom, so that the boys can make their annual donation in person. Last year, they raised $3,500 for the charity and even found some time to donate blood. The boys also plan to visit the Canada Centre again to bring Israeli children pairs of skates donated by the other students in the fraternity.

Each year, through their AEPI Rocks for Cancer Research" project, the boys raise money for the Canadian Cancer Society. Last year, the event raised $12,000.

By engaging in these philanthropic activities, the boys of AEPI are doing their best to dispel any negative myths regarding fraternities.

Offended by use of the word "Marrano"

I just read Leila Speisman's article ("Testing virtually eliminates Tay-Sachs among Jews," CJN, Feb. 3) about Tay-Sachs with the brief mention of Machado Joseph disease and an erroneous mention of familial Mediterranean fever as "Mediterranean fever." Familial Mediterranean fever also occurs in Ashkenazim. Generally, it is milder than the Sephardi variety. I have familial Mediterranean fever.

I am of Sephardi descent and come from several families of "Anusim," meaning "lost Jews." I returned to Judaism many years ago. Using the word "Marrano" in reference to those of Sephardi descent, whether crypto-Jews or Conversos, is horribly offensive. It may help for you to understand that Marrano means "pig" in Castillian Spanish.

I seldom see the word "Marrano" used by anyone except Ashkenazi Jews. I am asking you to delete this word from your lexicon of acceptable use. I have to say that when I saw that word in your article, I cried.

Negotiations will replace language of bullets: Abbas

This is the statement by Mahmoud Abbas.

In the name of God, His Excellency Mr. President Hosni Mubarak, his Majesty King Abdullah the Second, Mr. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, dear ladies and gentlemen, I first would like to start to express my gratitude and appreciation to President Mubarak and to the Arab Republic of Egypt for hosting this meeting as a continuity of the effective Egyptian role in sponsoring the peace process in our region.

I also thank His Majesty King Abdullah for his effort and the efforts of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, in this regard. And I would like to congratulate His Majesty and Her Majesty Queen Rania with a newborn prince, Hashim, and also congratulate him on his birthday.

We have agreed with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to cease all acts of violence against the Israelis and against the Palestinians wherever they are. Tranquillity and quiet that will be witnessed in our land, starting today, is the beginning for a new era – the beginning of peace and hope, [which was] announced today in addition to being the implementation of the first article of the "Road Map" [peace plan] that was established by the quartet [the European Union, Russia, the United Nations and the United States]. It is also an important step that provides a new opportunity for restoring the peace process and its momentum, so that the Palestinian and the Israeli peoples restore hope and confidence in the possibility for achieving peace.

I believe that we all understand our big responsibilities and joint responsibilities to consolidate this opportunity and to develop it. This can be achieved through the urgent work of restoring the spirit of partnership and reciprocity and [avoiding] unilateral steps.

And we have, starting this very moment, to protect what we have already announced, to provide the suitable mechanisms toward implementation. What we agree on today is just the beginning of a process of bridging the gap and difference among all of us.

We differ on several issues. And this may include settlements, the release of prisoners, the wall and closing institutions in Jerusalem. We will not be able to solve all of these issues today, but our positions towards these issues are clear and firm. Intensifying our efforts will lead us to implementing another obligation on the "Road Map," which is resuming the negotiations of the final status in order to end the Israeli occupation that started in 1967, of the Palestinian territory, and solving all of the issues pertaining to the final status – Jerusalem, refugees, settlements and other issues which were kept for the final status and negotiations, according to the terms of reference in the "Road Map."

Mr. President, His Majesty, Mr. Prime Minister, just less than one month ago the Palestinian people went to the ballot boxes for the presidential elections, which were held after the departure of president Yasser Arafat. In this remarkable democratic practice, the Palestinian people [created the] setting [for] the just peace that will put an end to dictates of war, violence and occupation. Peace means the establishment of a Palestinian state, the democratic state of independent Palestine alongside the State of Israel, as mentioned in the "Road Map" plan.

Here in the city of Sharm el-Sheikh, the city of peace, we renew, on behalf of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, and the Palestinian Authority, our adherence to the terms of reference of the peace process and to the resolutions of international legitimacy and all the resolutions endorsed by the PLO, the Palestinian government and the government of Israel, and the "Road Map" as well.

And also I assert our interest in respecting all our obligations and implementing all our commitments. And will spare no effort whatever to protect this newborn opportunity of peace that is provided through what we have already declared here today. We hope that our brothers in the Arab Republic of Egypt and the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, will continue their good efforts [along with] the international quartet [of nations] to achieve progress on the Palestinian/Israeli peace process, as well on the Syrian and Lebanese tracks [toward peace].

It is high time that the Palestinian people restore their freedom and independence. It is high time that the long decades of suffering and pain would stop. It is high time that our people enjoy peace and their right to live a normal life, just like all other peoples in the world, under the sovereignty of law, under one authority… and with political plurality.

We look forward to that day and hope it will come as soon as possible in order that the language of negotiations will replace the language of bullets and cannons and in which neighbourly and economic interaction will prevail instead of the war, in order to provide our grandsons and our future generations, Palestinian and Israelis, a different tomorrow, a promising tomorrow.

This is a new opportunity. A new opportunity of peace is won today in the city of peace. Let us all pledge to protect this opportunity in order to see that the wish of peace becomes a true and daily fact in this region.

Violence will not be allowed to murder hope: Sharon

The statement by Ariel Sharon.

I would like to thank you, the president of Egypt, Mr. Hosni Mubarak, on your welcome initiative and the kind hospitality for this important summit. We all hope and pray that this day will be remembered as the day on which the process began to move forward towards completion, towards the goal of a tranquil, dignified and peaceful life for all the peoples of the Middle East.

I also wish to convey special congratulations to Your Majesty King Abdullah, on the birth of your son Hashem and on the occasion of your birthday. May you live a long life filled with joy, and be able to lead your people to tranquillity and prosperity, and hopefully we can, together, strengthen the relations between us.

Congratulations are also due to you, the chairman of the Palestinian Authority, Mr. Mahmoud Abbas, on your impressive victory in the Palestinian Authority elections. Your victory and the path on which you wish to lead your people can mark a direction of real change to your people, which will affect the entire region. I hope that you will be able to lead your people on the path of democracy and maintenance of law and order, until the establishment of an independent and democratic Palestinian state.

Two thousand and five began as a year of great opportunity for all the peoples of the region, first and foremost for Israelis and Palestinians. We must all ensure that this opportunity is not missed.

We have an opportunity to break off from the path of blood which has been forced on us over the past four years. We have an opportunity to start on a new path. For the first time in a long time, there exists in our region hope for a better future for our children and grandchildren.

We must move forward cautiously. This is a very fragile opportunity that the extremists will want to exploit. They want to close the window of opportunity for us and allow our two peoples to drown in their blood.

If we do not act now – they may be successful in their scheme.

There is only one answer to them: we must all announce here today that violence will not win, that violence will not be allowed to murder hope. We must all make a commitment not to agree for a temporary solution, not to allow violence to raise its head, but to act together, determinedly, to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure, to disarm and subdue it once and for all. Only by crushing terror and violence will we build peace.

I have no intention of missing this opportunity – because we must not let the new spirit, which grants our peoples hope, pass us by and leave us empty-handed.

That is why we have acted quickly and with determination, with an understanding of the needs of the Palestinian side. Over the past few days, we reached a number of understandings with our Palestinian colleagues, which will enable us to grant both peoples tranquillity and security for the near future. Today, in my meeting with Chairman Abbas, we agreed that all Palestinians will stop all acts of violence against all Israelis everywhere and parallelly, Israel will cease all its military activity against all Palestinians anywhere. We hope that today we are starting a new period of tranquillity and hope. Furthermore, we agreed on a process of transferring security responsibility for Palestinian areas. I informed Chairman Abbas of our intention to take a series of confidence-building measures: soon we will release hundreds of Palestinian prisoners, and also establish a joint committee to explore future release of prisoners.

We wish to conduct genuine and honest dialogue in order to transform these first steps into a sound basis for the foundation of our relations.

I am determined to carry out the Disengagement Plan which I initiated. The Disengagement Plan was initiated by a unilateral decision. Now, if new change does emerge on the Palestinian side, the disengagement can bring hope and become the new starting point for a coordinated, successful process.

The Disengagement Plan can pave the way to implementation of the "Road Map" [peace plan], to which we are committed and which we want to implement. We are prepared to actively fulfil all our obligations, and expect the other side to carry out all its obligations.

Only actions and not words – this is the only way to attain the vision of two states living side by side in peace and tranquillity.

With your permission, I wish to address the citizens of both peoples:

To our Palestinian neighbours, I assure you that we have a genuine intention to respect your right to live independently and in dignity. I have already said that Israel has no desire to continue to govern over you and control your fate. We in Israel have had to painfully wake up from our dreams, and we are determined to overcome all the obstacles which might stand in our path in order to realize the new chance which has been created.

You too must prove that you have the strength and the courage to compromise, abandon unrealistic dreams, subdue the forces which oppose peace and live in peace and mutual respect side by side with us.

To the citizens of Israel, I say: we have passed difficult years, faced the most painful experiences and overcome them. The future lies before us. We are required to take difficult and controversial steps, but we must not miss the opportunity to try to achieve what we have wished for, for so many years: security, tranquillity and peace.

And one final call to our hosts and to the Arab leaders of the region: come let us join hands and create a new atmosphere of openness and tolerance in our region. Together we can build a dam against the radical forces of yesterday which threaten to carry us all into a whirlpool of blood and hatred. Together, we can promote relations between us and ignite a first ray of hope for all the people of the Middle East. Together, we can ensure our peoples lives of freedom and stability, prosperity and peace.

May we all be found deserving of this great opportunity which we have been granted.

Funding isn't the issue

Should democratic governments use public funds to finance private heritage or faith based education? The question is not new, but it spawned a rather ugly spectacle in Quebec recently. The Charest government decided to fully fund secular studies in Jewish day schools.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

As public outcry mounted, the Liberal Party caved in and reneged on its promise. The organized Jewish community of Montreal was shocked and disappointed. It was also dismayed, if not appalled, by public reaction to the plan.

Perhaps the matter was not handled well. There were errors of omission and commission, of poor explanation and judgment, misinformation and misdirection. In the midst of it all, anti-Semitism reared its ugly head.

The use of public funds for private education goes to the heart of some key democratic principles. All children should be educated and governments dictate not just the fact of education, but also much of the content. Consequently, it pays for public education. But when parents want their children to also learn about their own separate heritage, what is appropriate government input: just rules or funds too?

Admittedly, Jewish schools are better off in Quebec than Jewish schools anywhere else in North America: they receive 60 per cent funding for secular studies. Other communities would consider themselves blessed to have such resources. But that was not the issue here. Similarly, I do not think the question of anti-Semitism, as ugly as it is, should cloud our view of what is at stake.

Considering the kinds of comments, letters and editorials written against the funding, I think that all of Canada should be alarmed. For what I observed was the bursting of our multiculturalism dream. The complaints against the proposition became a lament against any kind of private education. "Why should they separate from us? Aren't we and our schools good enough for them? Why can't they be good Canadians and go to our schools? Why don't they fit in?"

These questions indicate a profound lack of acceptance of ethnic diversity. They lean toward a preference for an imposed melting pot rather than acceptance of cultural distinctiveness. It's not a matter that Christianity is taught in public schools here, nor that Greek schools are 100 per cent funded, nor that funding was promised long ago, nor that all parents pay school taxes no matter where they school their children.

What is at stake is not just public versus private schooling. What is at stake is Canada's, and particularly Quebec's, commitment to multiculturalism. Are we living in a country that truly accepts diversity of religion, race and ethnicity? Are we prepared as a nation to fight for heritage- and faith-based communities? Do we applaud or fear their continued survival as full Canadians? That is what is at stake!

The cost of being Jewish

The newly released UIA Federations Canada report on Jewish poverty, based on the 2001 census, revealed that 50,000 Jews in Canada – or 13.4 per cent of the Canadian Jewish population – live in poverty. As report author Charles Shahar says, this poverty level "strongly contradicts preconceptions held both by Jews and non-Jews regarding the universal affluence of Jews in our society." It is also a wake-up call to us.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

We should write this number on every synagogue bulletin board across the country and on the masthead of every newsletter and Jewish publication. We should engrave it on our moral compass. It translates into actual life situations for a population the size of my hometown!

Furthermore, while the percentage of Jewish poor has not changed much over the past three decades, the number of poor Jews has increased by 27 per cent! Oy!

Poverty in the Vancouver community triggered an analysis for our local Council on Poverty, Yad B'Yad. Let me tell you what being poor in the Vancouver area means if you want to participate in Jewish communal life. While the figures may be different for your community, the impact remains the same.

The total figure for all Jewish poor in British Columbia's Lower Mainland is 3,150. Some 420 Jewish children, a particularly vulnerable group, live in poverty, 13 per cent of the total. About half live in single-parent families. Almost one in five Jewish seniors is poor, and senior women are more than twice as likely to be poor as men (26 per cent versus 13 per cent).

In our report, we asked, "What does it feel like to be excluded from the community because you can't bring yourself to ask for one more handout from another Jewish institution? What is it like to move your kid to public school because you don't want to hear her cry when she is teased about her family's car or her clothes, or her modest (if at all) birthday party? How do Jewish seniors participate in communal life when they can barely make ends meet?"

There are outside pressures as well. In the past five years, single-family houses in the Lower Mainland increased in price by 40 per cent. Attached housing increased 35 per cent, condominiums more than 40 per cent. Housing costs often consume more than half a household's income. Needless to say, incomes have not kept up with such flagrant increases in housing costs. The withdrawal of federal and provincial governments from providing affordable housing has exacted a terrible price on the poor.

Now consider some costs of being Jewish: for a family with two children, providing a day school experience, synagogue membership, community centre involvement and summer camp can cost $13,000 a year at a minimum. (Without any extras, such as Hadassah membership or Combined Jewish Appeal contributions.) For an elder, even with no children to support, the cost of belonging adds thousands. And entering an assisted living facility in the "Jewish areas" can run $3,000 to $5,000 per month.

Yes, there are reduced fees for low-income families. But each time you approach one of these institutions, you must present the family's financial picture; at a minimum your tax returns. How many of us would enjoy that kind of scrutiny, four or five times over?

We are taught that to shame a person is akin to murder. How shaming is it for people to have to beg their way into Jewish life? No matter how humane the process, to have to repeat it over and over again is shaming.

Our Vancouver community is debating the process called Central Assessment Mechanism (CAM). A person applying for reduced or waived fees would apply only once to a single body, and then be spared the rigours of having to approach each organization separately. But we need to do more than that.

Poverty is a structural issue. If we are to tackle the roots of the problem, we need to go outside the Jewish community and make bold common cause with all other anti-poverty groups.

On at least two issues we need fast action. We need to lobby governments actively and effectively for a rush building program of affordable housing. We must lobby for affordable day care so that the single parent can live and work with dignity and know the children are cared for.

Finally, our own community must find the best way to assure low-income seniors that their lives will not be embittered by substandard living conditions, but that they are part of a caring community that will not cast them away when they are old.

Religious tradition and Canadian law

One of the major developments in the Canadian legal system over the past two decades is the tremendous growth of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) mechanisms.

ADR serves as an adjunct or complementary means of resolving disputes in a process operating parallel to that of the traditional court system. ADR applies the tenets and traditions of Canadian law in an expeditious and less formal fashion than through the regular courts.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Over the past year, much has been written about the move to employ the Islamic legal tradition, sharia, as a method of settling disputes – primarily matrimonial and inheritance related – among Canadian Muslims.

Sharia dates back more than 1,200 years and is derived from the Qu'ran. The objections most often raised against sharia relate to the disadvantaged position faced by Muslim women under that legal tradition coupled with the attendant pressure in Muslim families to settle disputes using sharia.

This use of sharia – in settling matrimonial and inheritance related disputes – is a form of ADR that will operate under the provisions of Ontario's Arbitration Act. It has also been suggested that sharia might also be employed in other provinces with similarly drafted arbitration acts, such as Alberta.

The Islamic Institute of Civil Justice and the Islamic Supreme Council of Canada are highly supportive of this initiative. In a report commissioned by the Ontario government, former attorney general Marion Boyd also expressed support of this proposal but recommended that certain safeguards be put in place.

Proponents of the use of sharia point to the existing use of similar ADR mechanisms to settle disputes among other faiths, including the application of principles of Halachah, in betei din, by some Orthodox Jews, also under the provisions of the Arbitration Act.

A unique characteristic of arbitration is that disputing parties must agree to submit to the arbitration process and be willing to be bound by its result. So a key issue that emerges is whether all parties to a particular dispute have freely consented, without undue pressure, to submit to the process.

The issue then arises as to whether the dictates of sharia or Halachah or whatever law and related values that govern are appropriate under the circumstances. With respect to sharia, we immediately recall infamous cases of women in Nigeria being sentenced to death by stoning for committing adultery. In our community, we should also be reminded of the experience of recent years of the sometimes coercive withholding of the get in resolving some matrimonial disputes in Canada.

One is not, of course, equating a sentence of stoning to the improper use of the get. Nor is one equating a penalty of stoning to the use of sharia provisions that would be applied in dispute resolution using sharia under the Arbitration Act. Rather, the fundamental issue to consider relates to the use of law, separate and distinct from the law that would otherwise be applied to the vast majority of Canadians.

Namely, is there one law for all Canadians or do we fragmentize our legal system and permit the use of different laws to be applied separately to different segments of society?

In a sense, we have already done so to a limited degree in our criminal justice system. There is a provision in the Criminal Code that specifically mandates courts to take into account the aboriginal heritage of an accused as part of the sentencing process. And, in certain cases involving aboriginal individuals, the sentencing circle can be used as a form of restorative justice. This addresses both the unique heritage as well as the historical disadvantage aboriginal persons have experienced in Canadian society.

But the debate about the use of sharia underscores the notion that we may be moving away from a uniform legal system toward the application of specialized law to select groups. While this may be somewhat troublesome, at the same time, it is also further recognition that Canada is a truly multicultural society and that meaningful multiculturalism is more than simply a demographic reality. It may manifest itself in many ways, including having an impact on our traditional legal system.

The application of sharia invites consideration as to whether our legal system should remain a homogeneously applied entity or whether it should demonstrate a flexibility permitting the law to address diverse values and needs within Canadian society.

The Kirshner File

Jewish general led Indian army to victory in 1971

In the annals of modern warfare, the 1971 war between India and Pakistan is regarded as a template of brilliance. Within 13 days, the Indian army routed Pakistan in one of the swiftest campaigns of the 20th century.

Occasionally compared to Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War, and studied at military academies as a textbook example of efficient planning, the Indo-Pakistan war gave rise to a new state, Bangladesh, and established India as a regional superpower.

Sheldon Kirshner in New Delhi

The major general who masterminded and spearheaded India's offensive, and who accepted Pakistan's surrender, was Jack Frederick Ralph Jacob, the scion of an old Jewish family from Calcutta. A spry bachelor of 81 who retired in 1978 as the commander of India's eastern army, he considers that war the highlight of a long and distinguished career as a soldier. Having written a book about it, Surrender at Dacca, published in 2001 by Manohar, he claims that the war was "surely the greatest military feat in our history."

Although historians are acquainted with his resumé, Jacob is not exactly a household name outside India. As I prepared for my trip to India late last year, I ran across his name in my research. Intrigued by the possibility of interviewing a Jewish warrior from an exotic country whose Jewish community is rooted in antiquity, I asked to meet him.

When I arrived in New Delhi on my last day in India, following relatively brief flights from Cochin and Mumbai, B.B. Mukherjee, a helpful contact from the ministry of tourism, was at the terminal to greet me with the news that Jacob had consented to an interview. I was pleased, but the timing was hardly fortuitous. I was tired, coming down with a cold and a hoarse voice, and my flight back to Toronto was just hours away. Nevertheless, I told Mukherjee I would be ready to talk to Jacob at his home in New Delhi at around five o'clock.

After a shower and change of clothes, I met Mukherjee in my hotel lobby, and off we drove to Jacob's flat in a non-descript gray apartment building in the centre of this sprawling city and capital of India. When we arrived, one of his Nepalese houseboys opened the door and ushered us into a dimly lit room filled with French furniture and crowded with original Mogul art on the walls.

Jacob, a surprisingly small man with a café au lait complexion and a formal manner, was smartly decked out in a blue blazer, creased pants, shirt and tie. He motioned me to sit down next to him on a narrow couch.

I began by asking him about his role in the war – the 33rd anniversary of which was marked shortly before my trip to India – and his decision to become a soldier. Jacob, whose Baghdadi family settled in Calcutta more than 200 years ago and whose father – Elias Emanuel – was a businessman, was quite effusive, enunciating his words in a posh upper-class Indian accent.

A brigadier-general by 1963 and a major-general by 1967, he was appointed chief of the Eastern Command in 1969 by Gen. Sam Maneckshaw, the Parsi chief of staff. Jacob's immediate superior was Lt. Gen. J.S. Aurora, a Sikh.

Jacob joined the British army in the summer of 1941 while at university and when India was still a British colony. He did so, he said, "to fight the Nazis." After graduating from officers training school in 1942, he was posted to northern Iraq in anticipation of a possible German thrust to seize the Kirkuk oil fields. He trained with Glubb Pasha's Arab Legion, which would be the backbone of Jordan's army. In the wake of Japan's defeat, he was assigned to Sumatra. Returning to an independent India after taking a gunnery course in Britain, Jacob commanded a mountain battery and served in an armoured division. Then, in short order, he took artillery and missile courses in the United States and was a general staff officer at Western Command headquarters.

"I didn't plan to be a career officer," he said. "I liked the army and stayed on. I did everything I was supposed to do."

During the mid-1960s, when India fought a war with Pakistan, he was the commandant of the School of Artillery. Subsequently, he was in charge of an infantry division in Rajasthan, where he wrote a much-praised manual on desert warfare. Promoted to chief of staff of the Eastern Command, based in Calcutta, Jacob was soon grappling with insurgencies in Nagaland, Manipur and Mizoram.

The Eastern Command was a sensitive one. The partition of the Indian sub-continent in 1947 had led to the emergence of India and Pakistan, which was made up of two distinct and geographically disconnected areas. Although East Pakistan was more populous than West Pakistan, political power rested with the western elite, causing resentment, unrest and calls for autonomy in the other half.

By 1971, East Pakistan was in revolt, and Pakistan's ruler, Yahya Khan, cracked down. As the violence escalated, with a massive loss of life and an exodus of millions of Hindu refugees into Indian territory, Indo-Pakistani tensions rose.

When India's prime minister, Indira Gandhi, extended assistance to Bengali rebels who sought to break away from Pakistan and form their own country, Pakistan responded first by attacking rebel camps in India and then, on Dec. 3, by bombing nine northern Indian airfields. In a dramatic broadcast to the nation, Gandhi declared war on Pakistan.

Having watched these developments with mounting concern, Jacob realized that conflict was imminent. "We knew we would have to intervene, but we hardly had any infrastructure and had to build it up," he recalled.

In consultation with his superiors, he refined his plan to engage Pakistan in a "war of movement" in difficult terrain with few bridges and roads, crisscrossed by rivers and broken up by swamps, mangroves and paddy fields. Jacob's strategy was clear. Dacca – the heart of East Pakistan – would be captured and Pakistani forces bypassed. Pakistan's communication centres would be secured and its command and control capabilities destroyed, while its forces would be drawn to the border. Some Indian commanders raised objections to the unorthodox plan, but it was finally approved.

Jack Jacob

"I planned for a three-week campaign, but it went faster than I expected," said Jacob, who instinctively understood that speed was essential and that a protracted war would not be in India's interests: The United Nations would apply pressure on India to halt its offensive, and the Soviet Union – India's ally – might not be able to fend off calls for a ceasefire.

As fighting raged, Jacob flew to Dacca and wrested unconditional surrender terms from his opposite number, Gen. Amir Niazi, who would later accuse Jacob of having blackmailed him into submission.

"It was a total victory over a formidable, well-trained army," he observed. "Had Pakistan fought on, it would have been difficult for us." Indian casualties were 1,421 killed and 4,058 wounded. "We expected higher casualties," he admitted. The Pakistani figures were much higher, in India's estimation: 6,761 killed and 8,000 wounded.

Jacob, who calls Surrender at Dacca the most authoritative and objective account of the war to date, ascribed his victory to a few factors – imaginative planning, flexibility of approach, the capacity to react to shifting and perhaps unforeseen events and, of course, luck. But for Jacob, a keen student of warfare, historical context was always of crucial importance. As he put it, "I've learned from every campaign since Alexander the Great and Napoleon."

Looking back, he described his 37-year career in the army as "the happiest and most enjoyable period of my life." Never once did he feel the sting of anti-Semitism in the Indian army. "But I had some problems with the British," he said, declining to elaborate. "I don't like to talk about it."

Interestingly enough, Jacob – whose Hebrew name is Yaacov Rafael and who serves as president of New Delhi's one and only synagogue – was not the only high-ranking Jewish officer in the armed forces. "There was another Jewish general, a chap named Samson, and he was in research and development and ordnance. And there was also a Jewish vice-admiral."

Upon leaving the army, Jacob went into business. But in 1998, he was called out of retirement to be governor of Goa, a former Portuguese colony popular with Israeli tourists. He remained there until 1999, when he assumed the governorship of Punjab, a job he held until 2003.

A three-time visitor to Israel who was once invited there by Yitzhak Rabin when he was the prime minister, Jacob was also on friendly terms with Mordechai Gur, a former Israeli chief of staff. Jacob played an indirect role in India's decision to establish diplomatic relations with Israel in 1992, but he refused to talk about his role in that diplomatic rapprochement.

Referring to himself as "a very private person," he was likewise reluctant to speak about his family, apart from saying that his brothers and sisters are deceased.

Today, in his twilight years, Jacob is a writer and lecturer on military and political affairs. But he wryly described his current status as "unemployed."

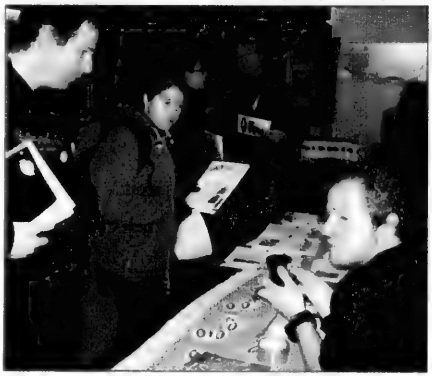
Hillel's IsraelFEST a citywide success story

By LAUREN PARL AND LIA KATZ

IsraelFEST 2005, put on by Hillel of Greater Toronto at six campuses across Toronto, including U of T , celebrated Israel's culture, arts, diversity and technological achievements. The purpose of this weeklong festival was to present a different side of Israel, one that is often omitted from its typical portrayal.

"Israel is a country rich in culture and diversity. It was great to share the things I love about Israel without getting into the politics of the region," said Shayna Levitan, a fourth year student at U of T.



University of Toronto students - both Jewish and non-Jewish - receive information about Israel from Hillel students in the Sidney Smith Lobby at U of T during IsraelFEST.

The events kicked off on January 27 with a concert by Idan Raichel, an Israeli-Ethiopian group, at the Danforth Music Hall. This Canadian premiere event, which launched the group's North American tour, reached out to the community and students alike, and was attended by 800 people. "It was very cool to see Jewish and Israeli Torontonians going nuts together dancing to Idan Raichel," said Isaac Apter, vice chair of Hillel at U of T.

IsraelFEST continued the next day with Shabbat dinners that hosted Canada Israel Experience mifgash soldiers (Israeli soldiers who participated on CIE birthright israel trips in 2004). With convenient uptown and downtown locations, nearly 200 students (mostly birthright alumni) attended this special Shabbat evening, co-sponsored by CIE, which included discussion groups with the soldiers lasting long after the dinners had ended.

Despite some attempts to detract from our events by other student groups, IsraelFEST continued in a very public manner with a marketplace of Israeli products and information called Shuk Day, which featured Israeli foods (falafel, bourekas) and snacks, IsraelFEST merchandise, and displays on music, sports, arts, science and technology, tourism, Hebrew University, Tel Aviv University and Israel humanitarian work. A huge Israeli flag hung from the ceiling, and for a day, the Sidney Smith building at U of T was transformed into a sea of blue and white. For more powerful, colourful imagery of Israel, Hillel also hosted Harel Stanton, an Israeli photographer showcasing his "1000 Faces of Israel" photo display, celebrating diversity, tolerance and pluralism.

Sarah Nasser, the chair of international affairs on U of T's Student Administrative Council, said, "it was advantageous for the university community to see Israel in a cultural, rather than political, perspective. It was a fun week full of great events!" Allison Mason agreed. "The best part was students and older people who came up to us to congratulate us on having such a positive event."

An Israeli shuk at the University of Toronto during IsraelFEST.

As always, Hillel remained focused on our positive programming through IsraelFEST 2005, a time for students who love Israel to come out and say so. We wanted to show everyone that Israel is more than the political hotbed that it is made out to be. Israel is a unique, democratic, multicultural and diverse country, and it deserves to be celebrated, free from politics and controversy.

Holocaust Centre contest will send winner to Anne Frank House

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

The mandate of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Holocaust Centre is to educate people of all ages so as not to forget, nor repeat the atrocities that befell the Jews of Europe and other unjustly targeted groups during World War II.

One of the centre's most successful education programs, that continues year after year, is its Ontario Provincial Arts and Writing Contest on the Holocaust, geared to teenage students, encouraging them to not only think through issues of that historical period and the relevance of remembering, but also to express their thoughts creatively.

This year's subject What would Anne Frank tell us if she were here today? is particularly timely because it has been 60 years since the famous diarist's death while imprisoned at the Bergen Belsen concentration camp. And, of equal significance, this year also marks 60 years since the liberation of the concentration camps at the end of WWII.

Martin Maxwell – a Holocaust survivor who escaped Vienna on a kindertransport to England following the Kristallnacht in November 1938, lent his support to the contest with a generous contribution for the prize winners. "Though we must remember the past, we must look to the future with hope - young people, especially, should look at it so that hate should not prevail," said Maxwell, who is also an educator with the Holocaust Centre and a member of its executive committee. In addition to Maxwell, Brenda Fishauf has been generously supporting the contest for several years.

The support of these two individuals from Toronto's Jewish community made high calibre prizes possible, which will be awarded in two divisions – students in grades 8-9 (Junior Division) and grades 10-12 (Senior Division).

The first place prize, in both divisions - an all-expense paid weekend in Amsterdam, Netherlands to visit the historic Anne Frank House - includes airfare, accommodation and meals. Second place prize winners, in both divisions, will receive round-trip airfare and accommodations to visit Washington, D.C. and the world-renowned U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. Third place winners, in both divisions, will receive $100 Canada Savings Bonds toward their post-secondary education. All winners and their schools will also receive a guided tour of The Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

Entries must be postmarked or received no later than Friday, April 1, 2005. Entries should be sent directly to: Arts/Writing Contest, The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, 4600 Bathurst Street, Toronto, Ontario M2R 3V2. They can be submitted on-line at www.jewishtoronto.com by clicking the icon that reads 2005 Ontario Provincial Arts/Writing Contest on the Holocaust.

UJA's kitchen queen hangs up her oven mits

For almost 30 years Frida Sloboder has been dishing out thousands of meals to the staff and countless visitors at UJA Federation. This year marks the end of her era as kitchen supervisor, a period that began in downtown Toronto, on Beverley Street, even before the Lipa Green Building, located at 4600 Bathurst, was a blue print. GMB Catering is now the building's primary food-source.

"I had two jobs in my life," said Sloboder. "The first was when I lived in Russia. I was a supervisor in a high school. The second was when I immigrated to Canada, and I've been in the kitchen ever since," she said.

Frida Sloboder

In 1976, at the age of 46, Sloboder immigrated to Hamilton with her husband. The following year, the couple moved to Toronto and applied for a personal loan from the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa (TJFLC). A TJFLC staff member suggested that Sloboder explore employment opportunities since her spoken English was strong. Sloboder attributes that strength to her university degree in Foreign Languages, earned in Odessa, years before.

"I went in, never thinking a job in a kitchen was in my plans," said Sloboder. "I was a teacher, a supervisor. I never pictured myself here."

"I always told my mother she spent too much time cooking, too much time in the kitchen. And look where I ended up, and now, I find it so hard to say goodbye."

Sloboder may be retiring but, she insists, she's not leaving. "This has been my family for so long. The people here were always good to me, and, in return, I made sure UJA came first," she said. "Everything I made, I made with my heart."

BJE looks to the needs of Toronto's Jewish immigrants

Outreach a major Board of Jewish Education priority

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

As the Jewish immigrant population in the Greater Toronto Area continues to grow, so too do their needs. For that reason, outreach to specific Jewish communities around the city is a high priority of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

Through its new Initiatives Fund, money has been allocated to research the specific needs and attitudes of the city's various Jewish immigrant sectors – with special emphasis on Israeli and Russian Jews.

"Our Initiatives Program is designed to penetrate markets that research has shown to be grossly underrepresented in our Jewish community," explains Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's Senior Vice-President for Jewish Education & Identity. "In many cases, these sectors have not yet found their comfort zone in our midst, and it may be the case that new settings will have to be established that meet new needs."

Last spring the BJE commissioned a comprehensive study of Toronto's Israeli community, and is about to do the same for both the city's Russian speaking Jews, and middle income, mildly affiliated Jews.

According to the study, the major concern among Israelis living in Toronto is the possibility that their children will become distanced from their Israeli heritage. Many of those surveyed believe the general Jewish community is not being open or welcoming to Israelis. Most of the Israelis questioned admit that they prefer an Israeli social group because it is more familiar to them and enables easier absorption into Canada. They also expressed concern that Jewish schools lack a secular Israeli approach.

"Ultimately, we'd like to find new Hebrew-speaking supplementary school settings that appeal to our Israeli community in terms of the curriculum, and to the Israeli culture," says Epstein.

A new initiative, based on the Israeli study is Tzofim – a new scouts group for Toronto's young Israelis.

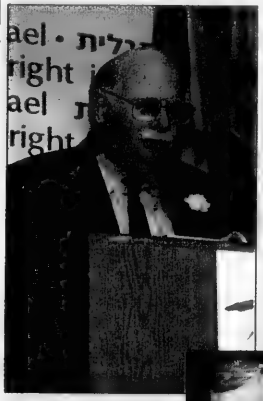
Through the Board of Jewish Education's new Initiatives Fund, outreach programs will be created to meet the educational and communal needs of Toronto's Russian and Israeli communities, among others.

TO'05 ready to inspire tomorrow's Jewish leaders

Prager, Steinhardt, Telushkin among line-up of top speakers

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

After the success of UIA Federation's Canada (UIAFC) National Young Leadership conference in Montreal two years ago, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has teamed up with UIAFC to host this year's event, called TO'05, in downtown Toronto, from April 1 to April 3.



The TO'05 Conference will feature high profile speakers like Michael Steinhardt (above) and Dennis Prager (right).

The goal of the conference is to bring 25 to 40 year olds together from across Canadian communities to learn, network and get rejuvenated.

"The conference is a chance to inspire and motivate emerging leaders. It's an opportunity, no matter what your needs, to engage with some of the brightest minds out there," said Alison Himel, co-chair of TO'05 with Liann Granovsky and Josh Cooper.

The National Young Leadership conference continues to increase in scale and outreach as years pass. The upcoming event will feature high profile speakers, such as popular American radio personality and writer Dennis Prager, renowned author Rabbi Joseph Telushkin, and birthright israel co-founder Michael Steinhardt.

It will also offer various tracks, such as a special session for birthright israel alumni only, as well as a Ben Gurion Society (BGS) reception, featuring guest speaker Brigitte Gabriel, an Arab from Lebanon and a professional journalist currently residing in the United States. BGS members are donors who give $1,000 or more to the federation annual campaign.

Aside from the intellectual stimulation, TO'05 offers its fair share of fun and entertainment. The main event, that will be open to all in the community, takes place Saturday night, April 2 in the popular distillery district of Toronto at the Steam Whistle Brewery. "The gala event offers a more relaxed atmosphere to those attending the conference and a chance to mingle with those not together in the days' sessions," added Himel.

The challenge, said Himel, is to satisfy all registrants and to keep the momentum going once the conference concludes. The organizers have already planned for a "get involved fair" during the weekend at which a number of organizations will be on hand to promote their work and recruit volunteers. "This answers the 'now what?' question," explained Himel. "Those on a high from the conference want to do something. This helps them take that next step." Also, every community has committed to plan its own event after the conference, as a means of maintaining the energy generated at the conference.

They were clearly identifiable as Jews, the older men with the distinctive appearance of Lubavitch Jews, and McBride, with his shaved head, bandanna, basketball jersey and tattoos, appeared incongruous in that setting, Locke said.

Though McBride had already consumed large amounts of alcohol, he was searching for marijuana, and he approached about a dozen young people from a Jewish camp. They asked him to prove he wasn't an undercover police officer and he showed them a tattoo that said, "Fuck cops."

A "sense of mirth" prevailed among the young campers, though some of their counsellors were feeling worried, Locke said. One of the campers said they had been busted for drugs and as a precaution kept the marijuana at a nearby Shell station. McBride was told to go there and give the attendant a password.

As McBride left, the youths were "falling on the floor" in laughter, not realizing he would return angry, Locke said.

When the station manager, who said McBride smelled of alcohol, told him to "get lost," McBride was "enraged." He grabbed the knife at the apartment and vowed revenge. The apartment tenant quoted him as saying, "I'm going to kill him," as he left.

In the J-One and King David restaurants, McBride confronted a number of customers, asking, "Are you the one?" His girlfriend, Mercedes Asante, the mother of his new son, urged him to forget the incident and think about their child. "You don't want to go to jail for something as small as this," she told him.

It was in the restaurant that McBride uttered the words "fucking Jews" or "motherfucking Jews," Locke said.

His friend, meanwhile, apologized to the customers, but McBride was already on the street, furious and intent on revenge. He ran into Rosenzweig, who was standing at the wrong place at the wrong time.

Only 10 or 15 minutes after he left the apartment, McBride returned, throwing the knife into the kitchen sink without bothering to hide it. "He fell to his knees and cried, 'I think I killed a man,'" the Crown stated.

Later, he called friends and told them of the incident, blaming it on drunkenness. One witness would have testified that McBride told him he stabbed the first person he saw, Locke said.

McBride was ushered into court last week with his hands cuffed together and a chain around his waist. He wore a loose-fitting black sweatshirt, white running shoes and his hair was pulled back into a ponytail.

Rosenzweig's widow, Chavi, along with her children, relatives, friends and supporters listened quietly as the proceedings unfolded.

McBride, who had a long criminal record prior to the murder, was returned to jail to await sentencing on Feb. 16.

Outside court, spokespeople for Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada commented on the role hate may have played in the crime.

Anita Bromberg, legal counsel for B'nai Brith, said the Crown's statement showed that "a guy angry at a Jew was content to take out his anger on another Jew. If that's not anti-Semitism, I don't know what is."

Len Rudner, Congress' acting national director of community relations, said the Crown's statement made a point of describing the distinctive attire of the Jews outside the restaurant. As well, it noted that McBride was intent on revenge. An important question is whether he killed someone he thought had fooled him or, "not able to find the people who tormented him, he was trying to get even with someone who looked the same way.

"If McBride knew [Rosenzweig] wasn't one of the people but fit the profile of the people who tormented him, then there was a racial element and the Crown should take that into account," Rudner said.

ANNE FRANK EXHIBIT AT OISE: Lesley Shore, who teaches a course on Holocaust literature at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, contemplates one of the 30 panels in the exhibit "Anne Frank: A History for Today." The panel shows Anne as a newborn, cradled in her mother's arms. Other family photos, as well as historical pictures and text, provide broader context for Frank's well-known story. The free exhibit, in the main-floor library of the Bloor Street institution, runs until Feb. 21, then again from Feb. 24 to Mar. 9. A 28-minute video and an interactive CD-ROM program are also part of the exhibit, which is curated by the Anne Frank Center in New York. This is its only Canadian stop before it goes to the United States for the next two years. Groups wishing to book tours should contact Shore at lshore@oise.utoronto.ca. [Frances Kraft photo]

Matches made in heaven?

By RABBI MENDEL KAPLAN

Rabbinic Reflections

The question of same-sex marriage is rocking our federal government and the foundations of our very society. Unfortunately, it seems to be off the radar screen of the traditional Jewish community. While Christian, Muslim and other faith-communities have mounted campaigns to try to preserve the sanctity of marriage, silence has largely been the reaction among Jews.

Yet, if pressed, any Jew who believes in the immutably Divine origin of our holy Torah and the revelation at Sinai will invariably express chagrin and disgust at this attempted redefinition of a hallowed institution. And for good reason: the Torah's divinely inspired tapestry of ethical conduct and sexual morality are being violently unravelled. So why aren't we speaking up?

Conferring the sanctity of marriage to relationships beyond traditional matrimony sounds very progressive. Proponents of the proposed watershed redefinition say it's the natural outgrowth of our ever-evolving enlightenment regarding human rights, which has gradually seen slavery abolished, women granted equal rights and the dismantling of race disparities in the West.

One Jewish MP recently told me that passing this landmark legislation would be an appropriate way to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, where, tragically, many homosexuals were murdered alongside 1.5 million Jewish victims.

This type of emotional rhetoric may have something to do with our muffled response. We who know more about discrimination and suffering than many others are exceptionally loath to appear discriminatory or bigoted, and so we should be. But this perspective is patently false, and it's a political distortion of the truth. The real issue is not human rights or persecution. It's the proposed destruction of the axiomatic divine principles introduced at Sinai 3,317 years ago. As faithful Jews, we must be concerned.

An examination of the concept "ohr lagoyim" ("light unto the nations") is in order. Our community is truly exemplary when it comes to caring for others. It consistently teaches the world how to share good fortune, prosperity and God's blessings, but it's not sufficient to serve as a "light unto the nations" with the Torah's lofty concepts of compassion, loving kindness and tzedakah alone.

While these are key to the Jewish portrayal of a just and righteous society, they alone cannot represent the heart and soul of our divine mission.

At Sinai, we were collectively charged with the sacred mandate of educating the world about God's true and objective code of morality known as the sheva mitzvot of bnei Noach – also called "God's seven universal laws for all humankind."

The fourth of these laws is about honouring the bond of family and the divinity of marriage. This is the true meaning of ohr lagoyim n'taticha ("I have placed you among the family of nations so that you may serve as a beacon of [spiritual] light"). God expects the Jewish People to make every effort to share the moral and ethical code that Moses conveyed to us with the civilizations we live in. We are expected to try to illuminate our societies with these timeless ideals. Anything less is a tragic abdication of our sacred obligations and an abandonment of a major detail of our divinely imposed mission on earth.

There is much more to the Torah's position on marriage. However, the crux of the matter is not whether one understands or appreciates the wisdom and virtue of God's decrees, but rather our obligation to observe divine precepts. A Jew must seek to follow the ways of Torah with utter devotion. At times, we may be fortunate enough to do this with clarity and comprehension. Other times, we may require blind faith, but we must always follow with devotion.

While we may not like this challenge and not relish being politically incorrect, doing God's bidding must always take precedence. In short, the time has come not only for traditional Canadian Jewry to find its voice and speak up, but to begin to lead this fight rather than follow.

What is Jewish art?

By ROSE ANN HOFFENBERG

Guest Voice

What is Jewish art? This short question should have a short and decisive answer, but the more I tried to define Jewish art for a recent talk that I gave at the National Gallery of Canada, the more the definition eluded me.

After a great deal of thought and debate, I established for myself four criteria that would qualify a work as Jewish art, and I suggest that some or all of these criteria should be fulfilled.

The first is that the artist is Jewish; the second is that the subject is Jewish; the third is that the intent of the artist was to depict and portray a Jewish subject and theme for a definite Judaic purpose, and the fourth is, uniquely, that the viewer is Jewish.

The celebrated 19th-century Dutch artist Joseph Israels founded the Hague School, which depicted peasant life – not a particularly Jewish subject. Yet, if you look at his later works of Jewish life, you would agree that they are Jewish art.

However, what about Rembrandt, a non-Jewish, 17th-century Dutch artist who respected Jews and depicted Jewish life and Old Testament subjects? I believe these are Jewish paintings because his intent was to honour the Jews and his works speak of this respect. Therefore, although it is helpful if the artist is Jewish, it is not as essential an ingredient as the subject.

Now, let us ponder a biblical work executed by the non-Jewish Renaissance artist Lorenzo Ghiberti, the Sacrifice of Isaac for the Baptistry doors in Florence. It was commissioned by the Church and the subject was chosen to highlight Christian doctrine: the subject, the sacrifice of Isaac, parallels Christ's sacrifice. This work could not be considered Jewish art because the intent of the artist had nothing to do with honouring the Old Testament. The work, therefore, receives one mark (the Jewish subject) by my scoring and one mark is not a pass. At the same time, the Jewish viewer who relates to this subject might want to give it two marks (the subject and the viewer).

In contemporary Montreal Jewish artist Betty Goodwin's series of "Vests," a non-Jewish viewer would see the works simply as vests. A Jewish viewer would also see them as vests until she or he learned that the series was done in memory of the artist's late father, a clothing manufacturer. Then she or he would conjure up the colourful life of a Jewish immigrant in Montreal. Hence, I have established a fourth criteria, the viewer.

The artist, the subject, the intent and the viewer are the four criteria that help define Jewish art. In my opinion, a work of art must have at least two of these criteria to qualify as Jewish.

I tested my criteria on the recent exhibition at the Art Gallery of Ontario in Toronto titled "Modigliani: Beyond the Myth."

The artist was born into a family of Sephardi Jews in 1884, in the Italian port town of Livorno, near Pisa. He was versed in philosophy, history and literature and steeped in humanistic ideals and enlightened Jewish thinking.

There is no question but that his painting of Joseph Levi (1909) and his drawing of Woman Heads and Jewish Symbols (1915) are Jewish from any viewer's perspective – these works pass four out of the four criteria. However, try as I might to look for the artist's Jewish experience in his sculptures, which were influenced by African statuettes, I could not call them Jewish art because they received only one out of four criteria (the Jewish artist).

A rabbi falls in love

Joy Comes in the Morning* by Jonathan Rosen, Farrar, Straus and Giroux.

Deborah Green is a personable, sophisticated, 30-year-old Reform rabbi ministering – as an assistant – to affluent Temple Emunah in Manhattan's Upper West Side.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The daughter of an atheist psychiatrist, she is surprisingly devout (large tallit, dietary restrictions, and even the wearing of tfillin in morning worship) and conscientious in her rabbinical obligations. She visits Roosevelt Hospital, delivers sermons, counsels converts and instructs bar mitzvah candidates.

Like most of her colleagues, she must also comfort and placate "difficult" and small-minded congregational members.

She likes to quote a saying from the Talmud, "The world is like a wedding." But she is unsure about her place in such a world. Part of her problem is that parishioners and friends tend to regard her as a figurehead, a person with a sacred calling, rather than as a woman.

Sometimes she doubts the efficacy of prayer and finds it difficult to maintain faith in a loving Deity as she contemplates a world filled with evil.

During a routine hospital visit, she comforts and prays with an elderly patient whose parents had perished in the Holocaust. There she meets his troubled son, Lev, a handsome science journalist who hungers for meaning and purpose in life. He is deeply Jewish in feeling and outlook, but at the same time reticent and confused about his identity.

Deborah takes him under her wing, instructs him in the nature of prayer, the intricate reasoning of the Talmud and the beauty of symbolism and ritual.

Initially, Lev is slow and awkward in responding to Deborah's warmth and interest. "The sheer fact that Deborah was a rabbi had almost paralyzed him. Lev could tell from the way Deborah dressed and how she carried herself and from the perfume she wore behind her neck and who knew where else that she did not believe being a rabbi was at odds with being a sexual creature." Finally, Deborah had led him into the bedroom. "'I'm a rabbi,' she whispered, 'not a nun.'"

The couple fall in love, begin to live together and plan for their marriage.

A suspenseful thread in the novel's finely woven tapestry is the erratic behaviour of Lev's close friend, Neal, a delusional and Holocaust-obsessed psychotic who stalks Deborah. Eventually he meets a dramatic and tragic end.

A humorous episode concerns Lev who, mistaken for a rabbi, is cajoled into officiating at a funeral. He approaches this task with fear and anxiety. "There was a dark spot growing in his brain, threatening to engulf him in shadows. He was sweating and had forgotten to bring a handkerchief. Indelicately, he mopped his brow with the sleeve of his blazer. He felt the cold steel button on his forehead. Silence from the coffin had spread to engulf the entire room."

What is impressive about this novel is the variety and amplitude of religious detail and reference: prayers, talmudic commentary, allusions to Jewish history, and modern synagogue and rabbinical problems. The book's title is taken from Psalm 30, "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy comes in the morning."

Splendidly written, rich in character delineation and filled with challenging ideas, Joy Comes in the Morning is a welcome addition to the author's previous books, Eve's Apple and The Talmud and the Internet.

Challenging vacations in Israel

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at vacation suggestions for people who want to spend their summer studying in Israel. If you believe that summer is the time to get out of the classroom, here are some suggestions for a challenging vacation, whether you're working the land, digging in it or hiking on it.

Anyone who has ever visited Israel knows that the most common profession in the country (after amateur political analyst) is amateur archeologist. Well, just because you don't live in Israel doesn't mean you can't dig through Israel's past. The Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs' comprehensive listing of archeological excavations of Israel is the best place to start. Six digs are listed for this summer, with minimum required stays ranging from two to four weeks. [http://tinyurl.com/3kd6f]

Archeological excavations include Tel Hazor, a major site in the Galilee located approximately five kilometres north of Rosh Pina. The population of Hazor in the second millennium BCE is estimated to have been about 20,000. Excavations this summer focus on the Israelite and Canaanite period. [http://tinyurl.com/5h5oz]

If you prefer to be closer to the sea, you can volunteer at Tel Dor, a major Canaanite-Phoenician-Hellenistic-Roman port on the Mediterranean coast, located between Tel Aviv and Haifa. This summer, they will be focusing on Roman, Hellenistic and Persian remains. Be prepared to work from 5 a.m. to 1 p.m. daily. [www.hum.huji.ac.il/dor/]

Do you want to be an "All-Terrain Jew"? Then the MARVA: Israel Outdoor Course may be for you. For young adults in good physical condition, MARVA focuses on "rigorous desert hikes," navigation, physical training exercises and self-defence. Training exercises takes place alongside young Israelis in an Israeli basic-training camp. A working knowledge of Hebrew is required. [www.israelprograms.org/OutdoorCourse.htm]

Generations of volunteers have enjoyed their summers at the quintessential Israeli setting – the kibbutz. If you're up to the challenge, then start your fact-finding mission at the Kibbutz Program Center. Their no-frills site outlines your basic options, including summer volunteer, kibbutz ulpan and kibbutz family adventure. [www.kibbutzprogramcenter.org/]

I found the Kibbutz.org.il site more informative and interesting. Not just geared toward volunteers, it gives a good introduction to the importance kibbutzim have played in Israeli society as well as articles about how kibbutzim have become more urbanized and a look at how the role of women on the kibbutz has evolved. [www.kibbutz.org.il/eng/] Here's a direct link to the part of the site devoted to volunteers. [www.kibbutz.org.il/volunteers/vomain.htm]

Beyond the fancy websites and glossy brochures, what's life really like for a kibbutz volunteer? The BBC (of all places!) has a good primer for what could turn out to be "the journey of a lifetime." Here's how it deals with the question, What do volunteers do? "The simple answer is they do anything they're told to… You could end up spending six months on dishwasher duty or your entire stay working in the cotton fields or cleaning the toilets." [http://tinyurl.com/5tr4k] Maya Lazarovitz describes her time on Kibbutz Kfar Hanassi as a mix of touring, learning Hebrew and hours working in the machbesa (laundry). [www.jewishmag.com/40mag/kibbutz/kibbutz.htm]

You can post your own questions at the Kibbutz Volunteers Open Forum [http://tinyurl.com/4bnb4]. Another forum [http://tinyurl.com/5bgh4] tries to bring together kibbutz volunteers from the past.

But the best place to get the lowdown on what to expect is on John Carson's kibbutzvolunteer.com. Carson spent two years on a kibbutz, loved it and wants to share what he learned. [http:///www.kibbutzvolunteer.com]

He links to a site that sells kibbutz volunteer paraphernalia. My favourite is the "ready-made" postcard, for times when you're just too exhausted to put pen to paper. It reads: "Hello from the kibbutz! Sharing a cosy graffiti-covered room with four foreigners and a dog with a limp. Good news though: I've been promoted to the 4 a.m. shift clearing the dung from the cowsheds."

Have a great summer.

Celebrations planned for end of Talmud study cycle

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

It's an event that occurs only once in seven and a half years, and Orthodox Jews in North and South America, Europe, South Africa, China, Australia and Israel are gearing up for it.

The eleventh Siyum HaShas – the celebration of the completion of all 2,711 pages of the Talmud, at the rate of one page a day – will be held on Mar. 1 in more than 40 cities in North America alone, including a large event in Toronto and smaller ones in other cities including Montreal.

Organizers in the New York area expect a total of 46,000 people at New York's Madison Square Garden and New Jersey's Continental Airlines Arena, and up to 120,000 across North America.

In Toronto 6,000 men, women and children are expected at the Ricoh Coliseum, part of the National Trade Centre at Exhibition Place. Men and women will be seated separately, as they are at any public event under haredi auspices.

The Daf Yomi (daily page) method of studying Talmud – the written embodiment of Jewish oral law – was introduced at Agudath Israel's first international congress in Vienna in 1923 by Polish rabbi Meir Shapiro.

According to a press release from Agudath Israel of Toronto, whose Daf Yomi commission is organizing the local celebration, Rabbi Shapiro's goal was "to bring uniformity to the study of Talmud and to enhance the sense of unity among Jews worldwide."

In Toronto there are believed to be almost 30 Daf Yomi groups, including four within Agudah, said Akiva Balter of the Siyum Hashas committee, which is chaired by Mark (Mordechai) Mandelbaum. There is also web-based study, and a phone number, Dial-A-Daf, to access recorded lessons.

Avromi Abish, a business owner who studies Daf Yomi with a study partner, said that when he is visiting family in New York or Montreal, it's easy to find a Daf Yomi shiur (lesson) to take the place of his daily chavrusah session, referring to traditional Jewish learning that pairs two students.

Abish's study partner Michael (Menachem) Brown, a hedge fund manager, was inspired to start learning Daf Yomi when he attended the siyum in New York in 1997 with his father and grandfather, who are now completing their third and fourth cycle of Daf Yomi study respectively.

Brown, who like Abish is on the committee for the Toronto event, recalls the siyum he attended as "inspirational," with a format that was both intellectually and emotionally stimulating.

The four-hour Toronto event will incorporate satellite hookups from other cities with local content including a children's choir, Holocaust commemoration, daily Minchah and Ma'ariv prayers, and a keynote address by Rabbi Aaron Dovid Dunner of London, England. Local Orthodox rabbis will participate, as well.

There will be sign language interpretation and "the highest level of security," said Balter.

Yechiel Kurtz, a dentist who teaches a synagogue-based Daf Yomi class, attended the last siyum at the Metro Convention Centre in Toronto with about 5,000 other participants, and has ordered his tickets for the upcoming event.

"It's the opportunity to celebrate the completion with everybody. It's definitely something special. All the Jewish people can come together at one time, and there's that appreciation that we're on the same page, literally," he said.

Brown said that for him, learning about Jewish law and ethics through his Daf Yomi study is "incredibly intellectually stimulating." He also said his example reinforces the importance of study for his children.

For information about tickets, which range in price from $8 to $100, call 416-785-4DAF or e-mail siyumhashas@rogers.com.

Greater Toronto Area

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Robert Burley's evocative exhibition of stark photographs on Toronto synagogues is the product of his fascination with historic buildings and his desire to find out more about the local Jewish community.

"Instruments of Faith – Toronto's First Synagogues" runs until May 21 at the Eric Arthur Gallery at the University of Toronto's faculty of architecture, landscape and design, 230 College St. It focuses on six early 20th-century downtown shuls still active today.

"There were two reasons I undertook this project," said Burley, a photographer and assistant professor at Ryerson University's School of Image Arts.

The Kiever Synagogue

"As an architectural photographer, I was fascinated by these synagogues, and since some of them are nearing their 100th birthday, I felt it was important to document their current condition as well as the changes that have taken place in their surrounding neighbourhoods.

"My second reason was purely selfish. It was a wonderful way for me to learn about Judaism and the history of the Toronto community."

A convert to Judaism, he conceived his project after accompanying his wife to a Rosh Hashanah service and a bar mitzvah ceremony. "In each instance, I was struck by the beauty of the [synagogue] interiors and the intimate quality of the services."

As he researched the topic, he discovered that there was little published material available, and that of 30 synagogues built by 1930, only the six in the current exhibition, all south of St. Clair Avenue, are still in use.

The shuls he highlights are Anshei Minsk Synagogue, Beaches Hebrew Institute, Kiever Synagogue, Shaarei Tzedec Synagogue, Knesseth Israel Synagogue and First Narayever Synagogue.

Four of the six are in the Kensington Market area. The other two are in the east and west ends of the city. They were constructed by eastern European immigrants to reflect the architectural styles of their former homelands.

What prompted Burley to act on his idea was a 2002 blaze that damaged Anshei Minsk Synagogue. "On the first Sunday after the fire, I went with a friend and an architect, David Binder, to photograph the damage."

But Burley was also inspired by developments in his own family. "As my eldest son neared his bar mitvah, I thought this project [would be] the best way for me to engage in Judaism and take a more active role in this family event."

"Instruments of Faith" is housed in a spare, well-lit white room, and consists of 20 crisp, wide-angled photographs of exteriors and interiors, 15 in black and white and five in colour.

Anshei Minsk Synagogue was founded in 1913, but its present building on St. Andrew was not completed until 1930. Additional photographs document the fire damage in the women's gallery and offer views of a hand-washing sink and the bimah and sanctuary.

Originally a Baptist church, the Beaches Hebrew Institute on Kenilworth Avenue was purchased in 1920. It expanded four years later to make room for a women's gallery. Two other photographs show Torah scrolls draped over a chair and the bimah and ark.

Dedicated in 1912, Knesseth Israel Synagogue on Maria Street is the last remaining shul in the Junction district. Through Burley's sharp lens, we also see its sanctuary and prayer shawls.

Shaarei Tzedec Synagogue, at the corner of Markham and Ulster, was founded in 1902. The current building was purchased in 1937 as Jews continued to move northward. There is also a view of the women's seating area.

The First Narayever Synagogue on Brunswick Avenue was founded in 1914 at the corner of Huron and Dundas, but has been at its present site since 1940. Seen, too, is the seating area from the bimah and Torah scrolls inside the ark.

Off in a quiet corner of the gallery, enclosed in a glass case, is a capsule photographic exhibit of long-gone synagogues by historian/archivist Stephen Speisman, author of Jews of Toronto.

The dozen or so photos, borrowed from the Ontario Jewish Archives and the National Archives and Library of Canada, chronicle the story of shuls sold or demolished for one reason or another.

Agudath Israel Anshei Sfard Synagogue, founded in 1914 on Palmerston Avenue, was torn down in 1925. Eastern Children of Israel Synagogue on Berkeley Street, established in 1918, was expropriated in the 1960s for the Regent Park housing complex.

Beth Lida Synagogue on Augusta Avenue, finished in the 1930s, was demolished three decades later. Holy Blossom Temple's former building on Bond Street was sold in 1937 and converted into a Greek Orthodox church:

Beth Hamidrash Hagadol Synagogue on McCaul Street was founded in 1904 and razed in 1959. Goel Tzedec Congregation on University Avenue, dating back to 1907, amalgamated with the Beth Hamidrash Hagadol shul to form Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

Tifereth Israel Anshei Ostrovzer Synagogue morphed into the Cecil Street Community Centre about four decades ago. Bais Yehuda Congregation on Dovercourt, founded in 1930, merged with Beth Emeth in 1963 and absorbed the Hebrew Men of England shul in 1975.

The fate of Hasiatyne Klaus Beth Israel Congregation on Brunswick Avenue, founded in 1935, goes undocumented. But this is a minor oversight in a fairly comprehensive exhibition.

Jewish Women International of Canada seeks Fundraising Director

Are you skilled at fundraising and marketing an organization?

The new vision of JWI is to transform the Jewish community's knowledge of and response to violence against women. We are committed to bringing about the urgently needed social change that will allow Jewish women to be safe and free from violence in all arenas of their lives - at home, work, school, play and sports.

Two years ago we initiated a strategic planning process with the idea of transforming the way Jewish women relate and affiliate with JWI. Now we seek an energetic fundraising professional to help bring our new vision to life. We hope to find a talented leader to assume the challenge of growing JWI into a financially viable and influential not-for-profit.

The Fundraising Director will report to the Executive Director and work in collaboration with the Board, volunteer leaders, community leaders, and resource people. Comfortable working independently and in teams, the Fundraising Director will be a personable community builder, a skilled listener, an excellent grant writer, and a charismatic presenter.

The Fundraising Director will have an impressive record of successful fundraising leadership and be able to:

- Lead the ongoing development of JWI's strategic plan
- Secure major gifts for JWI ideals and vision
- Uncover opportunities for program growth
- Initiate and oversee projects

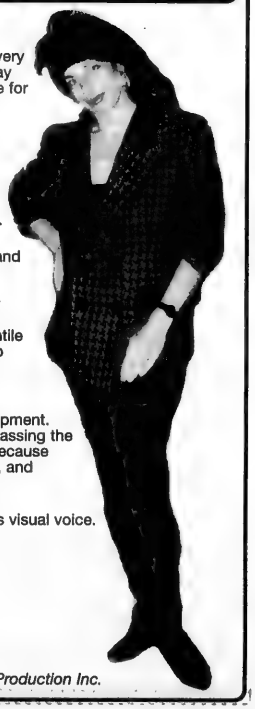
Compensation will be commensurate with ability and experience.

If you can meet this leadership challenge, please send your resume to Penny Krowitz at penny@jwicanada.com or by fax to 416-630-9319

An Open Letter to the Canadian Jewish Community

Dear Friends:

The last of the 613 Commandments legislates that every Jew is to write a sacred script. Through my screenplay Blueprint, I fulfill this mitzvah, and many will thank me for having the courage to do so.



Blueprint is a romantic drama about a lovely young mother struggling with an illness, and her old recluse neighbour who instills confidence, culture and calm into her stressed-out life, with some unexpected results. A rare kind of romance, set in Toronto, with scenes in Cuba and Israel, and based on a true story.

With this film, (that I am hoping Telefilm will support and Equinoxe release), I pay homage to elderly neighbours and the suffering of a generation. A generation that lived through the Depression, the war years, through illness and injury and economic hardship. Blueprint is a tribute story to an elderly Gentile couple who scrimped and saved all their lives, only to leave their entire estate to a young Jewish mother, in whom they saw a special destiny.

Blueprint has been a labour of love, 7 years in development. This faith-based film is about survival and trust and passing the torch. A film to honour our people and our parents, because every generation has an obligation to build for others, and cherish what was built for them.

Blueprint now needs production financing to reveal its visual voice. The still small Voice, that calls us by name.

Sincerely

Melanie Straus, BCom

Arab-Jewish dialogue brings hope to Israeli college

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Representatives from the Centre for Peace and Democracy Studies at Tel Hai College in Israel – a program designed to create an Arab-Jewish dialogue – came to Toronto last week to promote their message of hope and peace.

Rivka Taylor, an observant Jew from the Bet El settlement near Jerusalem, and Sabrin Odeh, a Christian Arab from Nazareth, are active in their community, and express their commitment to creating bridges between Arabs and Jews.

They do this by sharing their personal experiences, as well as performing songs in Hebrew and Arabic.

The dialogue is a model of how Jews and Arabs can relate to each other, and acts as a forum by which people can express their thoughts and fears about the conflict in Israel, said Sagi Melamed, the director of external relations at Tel Hai.

"What we realize is that college is the only place [in Israel] where Jews and Arabs can meet on equal ground. In school, it's a different school system, in the army, Jews see Arabs through the rifle's aim and not many Arabs serve in the military, very few do.

"College is the place where you can change people's perceptions, people's beliefs, people's stereotypes and get to know each other," he said.

Before Taylor joined the centre, she was like many Israelis who opted to keep her distance as much as she could from Arabs.

"When I was growing up I had to take a bus to Jerusalem and every single time I took the bus, [Arabs] would throw stones at us. They were my neighbours, but the only meeting that we had was through conflict and violence, so I grew up to learn that Arabs are my enemy and I better stay away from them," Taylor said.

She explained that staying away from Arabs, even on a campus where Arabs and Jews take the same courses, was easy to do.

"There are Jews and Arabs sitting together in the same class, but there's no interaction. There's nothing going on there – Arabs sit on one side of the class, Jews sit on a different side of the class, and that is how I spent my first year in Tel Hai."

Eventually, she heard about the Arab-Jewish dialogue course from a friend, who convinced her to join despite her reluctance.

Then she met Odeh, a girl from a "very liberal family," whose house was always open to political meetings.

"The group organized an outing to a kibbutz," said Odeh. "Rivka brought her guitar and we started singing all kinds of songs. I sang for her a chassidic song that I know, and from then everything began. We started working together."

Since then, they have both been very active in trying to strengthen the relationships between Arabs and Jews on campus.

Taylor recalls a memorable moment that made her feel like she was making strides in bridging the religious gap.

Last month, Taylor and her friend, a Muslim Arab, decided they wanted to do something to celebrate a Muslim holiday.

They set up a table on campus, got money for cookies and drinks and passed out flyers in an attempt to raise awareness about the holiday.

"In the end, we arranged for a [disc jockey], who played for free, and the whole college, for two hours, danced and celebrated the holiday," Taylor said.

"And I think that what made my day was when an Arab student came up to me and my friend with tears in her eyes. She couldn't get over it. She was shaking and crying and she was saying, 'I can't believe it, I feel like it's really chag.'"

Taylor and Odeh hope to inspire those they meet with stories of peaceful co-existence like this one.

"There are about 100 people already in that group and it has grown dramatically since it was established four years ago after the uprising," said Melamed.

He is confident that with the efforts of Taylor and Odeh, the group will continue to grow.

"We met with leaders in the community [in Toronto] that will help us get more people to establish a connection [with]. We have many Jewish partners in Toronto and our aim is also to reach out to the Arab community and give them the opportunity to support the peace building efforts in Tel Hai," he said.

An insider's insight

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Three items this week:

In the Canadian media, the Feb. 8 summit meeting between Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas at Sharm el-Sheik took a back seat to former Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's theatrical appearance at the sponsorship inquiry.

The reporting and analysis on the summit stuck with the familiar theme of cautious optimism. After four years of bloodshed, the ceasefire announcement was just the first step – albeit an important one – on the path back to the negotiating table. There was a general recognition that the hard work still lies ahead.

The summit received extensive coverage worldwide – Google News listed more than 4,000 items by mid-evening – but for the most part, it lacked fresh insights. One exception was Anna Maria Tremonti's interview on CBC Radio with former U.S. Mideast peace envoy Dennis Ross (The Current, Feb. 8). Ross discussed an often-overlooked issue in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict: the responsibility of the broader Arab world.

Said Ross: "One of the things that [Mahmoud Abbas] needs more than anything else is to have the Arab world embrace him in a cloak of legitimacy, and say that violence is wrong. And say that he is right to try to stop it and to contend with it, and to deal with those who might still purvey it."

It was important that Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and King Abdullah of Jordan were at the summit, Ross said. But "it will be even more significant when we have the Crown Prince of Saudi Arabia, the King of Morocco, the president of Tunisia, all of whom I think are committed to seeing a transformed region, having them take the next step as well... I want them to focus not only on what the Israelis have to do. It's no surprise when the Arab world talks about what Israel has to do. It would be a pleasant surprise to have them talk about what the Palestinians have to do."

There has been limited media coverage of the enormous "oil for food" scandal now erupting at the United Nations, involving allegations of widespread corruption in the $64 billion (US) program that was designed to alleviate the suffering of Iraqi civilians under UN sanctions.

From 1996 to 2003, Iraq was allowed to sell limited amounts of oil in exchange for humanitarian goods, mainly food and medicine. But an independent investigative commission headed by former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker reported recently that UN officials and politicians and businessmen from France, Russia and other countries allegedly received payoffs for procuring lucrative contracts with oil companies.

Former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein also received billions in kickbacks for allowing oil to be smuggled to Jordan, Turkey, Syria and Egypt. (The Clinton and first Bush administrations both turned a blind eye to the sales to Jordan and Turkey in the hope it would enhance those countries' economic stability.)

While there were some reports on Iraq's role, very few journalists examined how Saddam himself profited. Even fewer reporters explored any other aspect of Iraqi oil smuggling, though many knew that Saddam could not otherwise afford his extravagant palaces and grand mosques.

Most journalists simply reported on stories fed to them by the Iraqi regime which were naturally negative to the West – such as accounts of malnourished children suffering in Baghdad hospitals because of U.S.-led UN sanctions.

While it may have been very difficult to report the truth from inside totalitarian Iraq, there is no reason enterprising journalists could not have blown the whistle on Saddam and the UN program from the safety of the West.

Looking ahead:

Among the countries selected for an agenda-setting committee of the UN's Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR), scheduled to meet next month in Geneva, are major human rights abusers Cuba, Zimbabwe and Saudi Arabia.

Annual UNCHR meetings typically involve Israel-bashing and remain a sad indication of how far the UN still must go to achieve reform. It will be interesting to see how much attention the media give to this gathering.

Israel tourism booster slams airfares

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Israeli-born Ehud Telem, who owns and operates Peerless Travel, is determined to lower the prices of airfares from Canada to Israel.

"The pricing just doesn't make sense," he says. "Airfares to Israel from Canada are too high. Canadians pay more than anyone else. It's gouging."

He criticizes seat sales for being unreliable and says that airlines should plan strategies so their prices fit the season.

"I believe that winter prices should be lower and that there should be a consistency in pricing – and not penalize passengers who book well in advance."

Telem, the president and CEO of Peerless Travel, a travel agency that recently celebrated its 15th anniversary, has been working hard to promote tourism in Israel since tourism numbers decreased due to the intifadah in Israel and 9/11.

He has also been credited with revolutionizing the group-flight industry to Israel and now organizes bar and bat mitzvah tours in which youths and their parents celebrate the milestone on top on the Masada.

"There were seven buses in the largest group of family members taken to celebrate in Israel," he says.

He adds that he is delighted that in 2004, more than 6,000 Canadians visited the country.

Telem also runs Dan Tours, a wholesale travel company that customizes tours to Greece, Italy, France, Israel, Jordan, Egypt, Turkey and Morocco, and organizes international heritage tours, most of which are Christian trips that take tourists to visit holy sites around the world.

Telem was born in Nes Ziona, in Palestine, when the country had less than half a million Jews. After the declaration of the State of Israel, Telem lived a normal, small-town life in Nes Ziona.

He joined the Israeli Air Force in 1960, where he worked as a radar technician.

After he completed his service in 1963, he attended Technion University, graduating in industrial engineering in 1967.

He met Miriam Munk of Winnipeg when she was on a visit to Israel. They married and settled down in Nes Ziona, where Miriam, who is now the executive director of Beth David Synagogue, taught English to elite units of paratroopers.

Telem joined El Al Airlines as an assistant to the vice-president of commercial sales and marketing. In 1983, El Al posted him to Toronto, and he became the district manager for Ontario and western Canada.

In those day, he says, Torontonians couldn't fly to Israel without flying to Montreal first. But through his efforts and tenacity, he managed to re-organize the flight structure throughout Canada.

"I began visiting travel agents, offering them incentives to book passengers on El Al. We doubled the sales in two years and through negotiating landing rights with Canadian Pacific, Israeli flights were scheduled to and from Toronto."

He eventually left El Al to work at local travel agencies in Toronto, and after four years he decided to enter a partnership in a travel agency. He later bought out his partners and Peerless Travel began its expansion.

Telem says he is proud of the fact that his company promotes tours throughout the world.

"We are one of the largest church tour operators in Canada and the largest promoter and seller of travel from Canada to Israel," he says.

He is delighted that the tourism industry is bouncing back from the blow it took after 9/11.

"We are getting back to the numbers we had before 2000 with more synagogues, organizations, churches and interfaith groups planning trips. After four years of holding back, people now realize that they can't stay at home forever. In reality, the risks are very small," Telem says.

Birdman of Israel saves lives and planes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Thanks to Israeli ornithologist and naturalist Yossi Leshem, birds and planes can now share Israel's crowded skies with little danger of bumping into each other.

Leshem, the director of The International Center for the Study of Bird Migration in Latrun, devised a pioneering bird-avoidance system that has saved lives and hundreds of millions of dollars.

Bird strikes are the bane of all pilots, whether in Israel or elsewhere.

They killed three Israeli combat pilots and resulted in the loss of eight aircraft between 1972 and 1997, and claimed the lives of 41 Western air force pilots and destroyed more than 130 of their jets over a 30-year period.

Leshem, an expert in bird migration patterns in the Middle East who took up birding after finishing the army, recognized the problem. In 1984, he produced a map of "bird-plague zones" Israeli Air Force pilots should avoid. Subsequently, he helped establish a radar monitoring system that provides daily bird forecasts and real-time warnings.

Since then, bird collisions with military planes have dropped by a whopping 76 per cent, saving Israel $660 million in aircraft losses and accidents.

Leshem's early-warning system has been adopted, at least in part, by the Royal Jordanian Air Force and the Turkish Air Force. The United States Air Force used Leshem's technique to track bird movements in Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia during the 1991 Gulf War.

As he never tires of saying, Israel is a bird watcher's paradise, but a hazard for pilots.

In spring and autumn, 500 million birds fly over Israel to and from their winter homes in Africa and their breeding grounds in Europe and Asia.

This makes Israel an international crossroads for birds such as pelicans, storks, eagles and buzzards, said Leshem, a member of Tel Aviv University's zoology department. But unfortunately, pilots flying military aircraft often share a similar altitude with migrating flocks, thereby creating a potentially fatal problem.

A big, burly man who was recently in Toronto at the invitation of the Canada-Israel Committee, Leshem initially encountered the problem in 1980 when he began studying the migration of raptors across Israel.

Acting on a suggestion by a pilot that he could obtain better data by observing the birds in the air rather than from the ground, he asked the Israeli Air Force for a plane. It was then that he discovered that bird/plane collisions were costing Israel dearly.

Consider this fact. When a white pelican hits a plane in full flight, the devastating force it exerts is equivalent to about 100 tons. Shocked by these disclosures, Leshem developed a map advising pilots what areas of the sky to stay clear of.

He collected a good deal of his information from bird migration patterns and bird watchers' surveys. The rest he obtained from personal observation by taking to the skies in a motorized glider and flying wingtip to wingtip, for almost 1,500 hours, alongside birds like seagulls, cranes, finches and starlings.

The "bird-plague zone" map in and of itself, however, was insufficient. Radar stations were required, too. Two facilities were built, the first in the Negev and the second in the foothills of Jerusalem. A third station is scheduled to be opened later this year.

Yossi Leshem

Leshem's system, though, is not foolproof.

In 1995, an F-15, worth $50 million, struck three storks over the Negev. The plane crashed and the pilot and navigator were killed. Just two years later, an F-16, valued at $27 million, hit a honey buzzard during a training mission in the Arava. The pilot bailed out, but lost his leg.

There have been no crashes since 1997, but in a typical year, Israel registers some 200 bird strikes, which cause little or no damage and injury to the planes and pilots.

Leshem's system, which Israel's civilian aviation sector has adopted, is useful in takeoffs and landings. Nevertheless, bird strikes afflict 20 Israeli and foreign commercial airliners on average per year, resulting in damages upward of two million dollars.

In one case he cited, an El Al jumbo bound for New York City had to jettison 75 tons of fuel into the Mediterranean Sea after two partridges penetrated an engine.

Leshem – whose love of nature stems from the hikes he enjoyed as a boy with his German-born mother on Mount Carmel – also directs Migrating Birds Know No Boundaries. It's a U.S.-funded program that tracks birds by satellite and teaches Israeli, Palestinian and Jordanian students about migratory bird patterns.

The second Palestinian uprising disrupted the school program, which involved 5,000 children in 250 schools. But Leshem continues to work with his Arab colleagues, and believes Migrating Birds Know No Boundaries could be a catalyst for peace.

In addition, Leshem is working on a project to control rodent pests on Israeli farms with birds rather than chemicals. Twenty five kibbutzim have signed up and many more have shown a keen interest.

Two women always aim for the sky

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Some women drive minivans. Daphne Schiff, 80, and Adele Fogle, 71, drive airplanes.

More than 30 years ago, Schiff got her pilot's license in Montreal. Fogle got hers in Toronto. Since then, they have both spent their time raising children, pursuing professions and accumulating flying hours.

After graduating from the University of Toronto with a degree in science, Schiff began teaching chemistry and physics at York University, where she still teaches the Science of Flight. Fogle opened Aviation International, a business that teaches flying, charters and services planes, sells fuel and runs a restaurant. In their spare time, the two women fly aid shipments to Africa.

In the air, they learned to overcome the challenges related to unexpected storms and engine failure. On the ground, they learned to deal with the hurdles associated with being among a handful of women in a profession dominated by men.

"In those days, Jewish women thought I was absolutely nuts," said Adele Fogle, who is a member of Beth Emeth Synagogue.

"It was impossible to convince any of my friends to go flying with me," she added.

So, Fogle joined The Ninety-Nines, an international association of women pilots started in 1929 by Amelia Earheart. That's where Fogle met Daphne Schiff. Since then, the two women have teamed up to compete in various races.

In 1985, they flew across the Atlantic in the Transatlantic Air Race, where they came in second. In 1994, they flew in the Round the World Air Race, and in 1996, they flew in the Air Race of the Americas. More often than not, their flying time was spent in single- or twin-engine prop planes. For those who may not know, these are very small planes.

When asked about the dangers involved, Schiff and Fogle seem unperturbed.

Schiff recalled the time they were at an altitude of 10,000 feet over the ocean about 100 miles from Chile when both engines on their twin-engine plane stopped running.

Was she afraid?

"We got out our checklist and eventually found water in the tanks," Schiff said very matter of factly, adding that perhaps she was a bit nervous a day or two later when she thought about what had happened.

Fogle maintains that it's not that hard to do what they do. "Flying isn't rocket science. Anyone can become a pilot. It will open up their whole world."

But she knows that not everyone is convinced. Fogle, who is involved with the Shearim Hebrew Day School, admits that although she gives the students gift certificates for free flights every year, no one has ever taken her up on it.

In their retirement years, the two women have taken their flying skills and spunk to Air Solidarité, a humanitarian organization that provides assistance to small villages in central Africa.

"We decided that it was time to do something more useful than just winning a cup or a race," Schiff said.

The past few years, the two women have worked with Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian Relief Committee, to raise the $15,000 minimum required by Air Solidarité to participate in its annual aid effort. The money eventually goes towards one of the Air Solidarité's projects – which include building water purification plants, implementing women's literacy programs and initiating health centres.

In addition, Schiff and Fogle try to fill their planes with pharmaceutical and school supplies donated by Canadian companies.

Once the financial requirements are met, they fly to France on commercial planes. In Paris, they join a team and get their instructions, which can vary from equipping health clinics to bringing school supplies. Once everything is in place, the two women pilot a single-engine plane 6,000 kilometres through central Africa, where they deliver their supplies and check in on some of the villages Air Solidarité has helped in the past.

While each stop is a different experience, Schiff said they are welcomed wherever they go.

"Whenever we land, people line the runways. The sight of children greeting the planes is overwhelming."

This year, Schiff and Fogle are worried that with all the attention being paid to tsunami relief, they may not be able to raise the funds needed to make next October's Africa trip.

"The tsunami has definitely taken over the news. Everyone seems to have forgotten the needs of the people of Africa," Schiff said.

But she insists that, as she once heard someone say, "the tsunami was an act of God that happened quickly. Africa is an act of man that goes on and on."

Bloc MP wants territories excluded from CIFTA

MONTREAL – The Bloc Québécois's international trade critic has introduced a private member's bill to exclude from the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA) any goods produced in territories administered by Israel.

Pierre Paquette, MP for Joliette, wants the CIFTA amended to limit its application to goods produced in territories "recognized by the international community and the United Nations."

He said products from territories occupied by Israel since 1967 should not "benefit from the advantages" provided in CIFTA, which was signed in 1997, but rather be subject to full duty.

"I am certain that passing this bill, in keeping with Canada's policy of equal treatment of the parties, will contribute to reopening the 'road map' to peace and will ensure a lasting peace between Israel and Palestine."

Bill C-326 was seconded by Bloc MP Paule Brunelle, MP for Trois-Rivières.

Paquette noted that the European Union adopted this policy in 2001.

The bill asks International Trade Minister Jim Peterson to review with the Israeli government the list of products benefiting from reduced tariffs. Israel currently certifies goods from the settlements as being of Israeli origin.

Paquette introduced a similar bill in April 2002, which spoke specifically of exclusion of goods originating in Jewish settlements, including east Jerusalem. It died on the order paper.

David Cooper, the Canada-Israel Committee's government relations director, said this latest bill "will probably not go anywhere" either, but the the CIC will be monitoring how it proceeds.

"Naturally, we are troubled by it... We don't see the logic that this bill will advance the peace process," he said.

First elected to Parliament in 2000, Paquette is the former secretary-general of the Confédération des Syndicats Nationaux, a major labour federation, and television host with Télé-Québec.

'Jerusalem was the highlight,' MP says of his trip to Israel

By JOEL JACOBSON
Special to The CJN

HALIFAX — When Michael Savage had the opportunity to go to Israel, and specifically to Jerusalem, he jumped at the chance to fulfil his father's dying wish for him.

Last month, the MP for the Nova Scotia riding of Dartmouth-Cole Harbour spent five days in Israel on a trip with the Commons standing health committee, which was studying the country's emergency preparedness.

His father, the late Dr. John Savage, a former premier of Nova Scotia and a staunch Catholic, had visited Israel and seen places of history there, and he specifically told Michael, one of seven children, that he must visit the Holy City.

"Seeing Jerusalem was the highlight of the trip," Savage told 60 members of the Beth Israel Synagogue at a community breakfast on Feb. 6.

"The beauty of the buildings, the history of the specific events that happened there – such as it being the place of the crucifixion – seeing people of different faiths approach the Western Wall with such awe, you'd have to be a very unfeeling person not to be affected."

Michael Savage

But he said he was equally impressed with all parts of Israel, specifically its hospitals and research centres and the people who work there.

Travelling on his first-ever visit to the Jewish state in a group headed by Carolyn Bennett, the federal minister of state for public health, Savage said he was especially intrigued by the Israel Center for Medical Simulation at Chaim Sheba Medical Center.

"We saw students working on dummies with simulated heartbeats and ailments, and the testing they went through to deal with each and every one," he said.

"I was impressed with the professionalism of the people," he said. "The medical people have such a human approach."

Savage said he didn't think he was telling the Beth Israel audience anything about Israel they didn't already know, "but for the average Canadian it would be surprising how interdenominational Israel is. It would be an eye-opener for most Canadians."

Discussing the emergency preparedness of Israeli medical centres, Savage said he observed four things: "the expectation of being constantly ready for a crisis, the drills and practice and training, the flexible capacity of the system, and the information flow so that everyone knows what is happening and who and what is needed."

Israeli health care officials told the Canadian group that they can order 20 per cent of the bed capacity to be made available on a moment's notice in case of emergency.

"Can you see that happening in Canada?" Savage asked. "You'd have to go through federal, provincial and municipal governments and then a regional health board before you could get anything like that approved."

Savage said he also learned that Israel is a pioneer in many areas of health care and successful in things such as "sociology and chronic disease prevention. I learned Israel has the lowest percentage of HIV [infection] in the western world and that, above all, emergency preparedness is a way of life."

He continued, "We were told of Israel's size [about that of Nova Scotia's Cape Breton Island], but not told that much about the people around them who don't want Israel to exist. Yet every day, [emergency workers] deal with various groups of people, Israelis and their neighbours, in emergencies. And they do this work with a distinct lack of hate."

Savage said he felt "entirely safe" in Israel.

"When in Tel Aviv or Haifa, a Canadian might think he's in a great city of the world like Dartmouth," he joked.

Centraide ends 30-year funding deal in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — FEDERATION CJA will not receive the approximately $1-million allocation it has been getting in recent years from Centraide of Greater Montreal this June, because Centraide's board of directors decided to terminate a 30-year agreement on funding.

Although disappointed, the federation is not protesting the decision by Centraide – the Montreal equivalent of the United Way – which was, in fact, made last June, but only made public this month by the newspaper Le Devoir.

"While we would have certainly preferred to see the relationship continue, we can understand, from Centraide's point of view, its desire to regularize an anomalous situation," said Bram Freedman, the federation's director of operation and strategic initiatives.

The federation's constituent agencies can apply individually to Centraide for funding, like any other charitable organization in the city. Freedman said some have already done that, if they meet Centraide's eligibility criteria. Among the 13 agencies are those open to the public, such as the Jewish Public Library and the YM-YWHA. "Our hope is that the total amount given to our agencies will be similar," he said.

If not, the loss of $1 million dollars could have a practical impact. About 60 per cent of Combined Jewish Appeal's net proceeds are spent locally, and last year that amounted to some $23 million. Centraide's allocation was used only for local services.

Freedman said federation was notified in advance by Centraide that it was reviewing the agreement, so the decision was not a surprise.

The agreement, first struck in 1974 and updated over the years, was ended as a result of the controversy stirred by a front-page story in Le Devoir in November 2003 that purported to be an exposé of a clandestine deal that gave "special privileges" to the Jewish community.

The federation was guaranteed a percentage of the net proceeds of Centraide's annual campaign equal to the percentage of Jews among the population of Montreal, which according to the 1991 census was 3.4 per cent.

The actual amount given to the federation has grown as Centraide's campaigns raised more, reaching $1 million a couple of years ago. The federation was the recipient of the second-largest single allocation, after Catholic Community Services, among Centraide's now more than 325 beneficiaries. In last June's round of allocations, that amounted to more than $967,000 out of Centraide's $33.5-million budget.

The agreement also exempted the federation from Centraide's normal scrutiny of the financial operations of the agencies it funds, and from a fundamental rule that agencies not conduct their own general campaigns. In exchange, the federation was to encourage members of the Jewish community to participate in the Centraide campaign, as well as keep its historic commitment not to solicit donations to CJA from the general community. Both campaigns are held at about the same time in the fall.

While the deal may not have been common knowledge, it was not secret. When ties between the two organizations was redefined as a "partnership" in 1999, for example, a press conference was called to announce the signing.

The 2003 Le Devoir story, headlined "Centraide verse un million à un organisme quarante fois millionaire" ("Centraide gives a million dollars to an organization that has a million 40 times-over"), also questioned giving such a large sum to an organization that raised $43 million that year, $2 million more than Centraide.

Pierre-Marie Cotte, Centraide's vice-president of philanthropic development, said that after the story, Centraide was contacted by about 100 donors opposed to the deal. Most, he said, weren't opposed to the Jewish community receiving funds, but wanted its agencies to be treated the same as any other. "Many disagreed with the fact that we give a kind of automatic allocation to the federation," while "some feared that the money was going to Israel," he said.

He said Centraide is evaluating applications from federation agencies, and a decision on them will be made in March or April. He said Centraide wants to maintain a cordial relationship with the community.

Ottawa creates a federation structure

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Jewish community of Ottawa is about the join the ranks of other North American "federations," as a result of a two-year strategic planning process.

Until now, the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir was the governing structure of the community, while the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) was a separate organization that collected funds for local needs, Israel and overseas Jewish aid.

At a recent meeting that was open to the Jewish community, new bylaws were passed to create an umbrella organization that made UJA part of a new structure similar to Toronto's UJA Federation or Montreal's FEDERATION CJA.

Vaad Ha'Ir president Arnie Vered wrote in the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin that "the mission of this new federation is to plan for the evolving needs of the community, raise and allocate funds for communal priorities, co-ordinate community programs and activities for these purposes and promote an understanding of, and respect for, the Ottawa Jewish community and its values as well as of Judaism and the Jewish way of life."

The new structure will be managed by a board of directors, with five core committees: a financial resource development committee (to oversee all community fundraising); a planning and allocations committee; a financial, audit and administration committee; a communications and community relations committee, and a Jewish identity and responsibility committee.

Each of the committees will have subcommittees as required, enabling interested members of the community to become involved in various projects. It is intended that the new structure will draw many more individuals into active participation in the Jewish community, Vered said.

Bernard Dolansky, one of the architects of the new bylaws, said a task force, which included co-chair Ron Prehogan, "went out and listened to constituents in the community and what they asked for. We weren't governing strictly according to our old bylaws because they were formulated 20 or more years ago. During that time, the community has changed, as have its needs.

"We wanted a system that was open and transparent to the community and that allowed for a two-way flow of responsibility… most people felt that we had a top-down system. We tried to design a system that was bottom up and would give people real jobs to do and real responsibilities."

Several suggestions have been considered for naming the new body, but no final decision has been made. Vered plans to announce the name before an annual general meeting in June.

Extremism 'has too loud a voice': U of T student

By DANIEL ROTH
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

During my time at the University of Toronto, I have worked hard to carve out a place for Jewish students like me.

Many of us – myself included – define ourselves as Zionists, and all of us agree that both Israel and a Palestinian state deserve the right to exist side by side. We are students who would not label ourselves "pro-Israel," or "pro-Palestine," without also labelling ourselves "pro-peace."

I am 23 years old. I have grown up in Toronto in Hashomer Hatzair, a progressive Zionist youth movement. I am currently the president of Hashomer's branch at U of T called "Kidma." As well, I am a member of Hillel's Israel affairs committee and its community council.

Recently, life on campus has left me tired, frustrated, and with a lot to say.

The last few weeks at U of T have been somewhat out of the ordinary. IsraelFEST, a celebration of Israeli culture and diversity, is an event that has been run by Hillel at U of T around the end of January for many years.

This year, it was different.

During the same week, U of T's Arab Student Collective (ASC) held "Israeli Apartheid Week." The events included a nightly speaker series, at which there were lectures on many of the negative issues surrounding Israel, such as the situation in the West Bank and Gaza. Organizers also erected a mock refugee camp in one of the main buildings on U of T's downtown campus.

Some Jewish students have said that they have felt intimidated on campus over the last few weeks, while others have said that it has not affected them all that much.

But the majority agree that despite the bad taste that some of the events left them with, most organizations and most of their members acted responsibly in dealing with fellow students, the university administration and the community during this heated time.

All of this has put me in a very pensive mood.

I, along with many other Jewish students, believe wholeheartedly that both IsraelFEST and "Israeli Apartheid Week" should be allowed at U of T – though the timing of the events is another issue entirely.

Free speech is not just an ideal to be brushed away every time it leads to negative things being said about us, or the things that we believe in. At the same time, it means that as an eclectic group of Zionist students, we have the right and the responsibility to be outspoken in our opinions.

These last few weeks have reminded me that extremism on all sides has too loud a voice, considering that it represents very few people. (The ASC's divestment rally on the last day of their events barely drew 20 people.)

I have also been reminded that those of us who are "pro-peace," despite our races and religions, are in the majority, albeit a silent majority, but the silence is what so many of us are working to change.

As a Jewish Zionist student and as a human being, and after experiencing the recent events at U of T and their aftermath (so far), I can safely say that I have learned a lot.

Despite much of the negativity surrounding all of this, I have been reminded of the (silent) masses that are willing to teach, learn and talk for peace.

Tilly Shames, director of Israel affairs for Hillel of Greater Toronto, quoted Josh Neuman, the editor of Heeb magazine, when she explained her feelings on the issue. She said, "You can either stay in the darkness or light candles."

I agree. Let's all light candles and move forward.

Daniel Roth is a third year student at the University of Toronto and an associate news editor with the Varsity, one of U of T's main student newspapers.

Fackenheim's thinking on Shoah may have changed, scholar says

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Benjamin Pollock, left, the Ray D. Wolfe Fellow at the University of Toronto, is seen with Rose Wolfe, centre, and Derek Penslar, director of U of T's department of Jewish studies.

A young academic contends that eminent Jewish philosopher Emil Fackenheim may have reversed or re-thought his philosophical response to the Holocaust, the central theme of his work.

Benjamin Pollock, the Ray D. Wolfe Fellow in the University of Toronto's Jewish studies program, recently spoke about Fackenheim's position on the Holocaust at a public lecture sponsored by the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's Canadian Jewish News Fund.

Fackenheim was a philosophy professor at U of T from 1948 to 1984 and a co-founder of the university's Jewish studies department. He later taught at Hebrew University in Jerusalem. Pollock, a doctoral student in the department of Jewish thought at Hebrew U, was Fackenheim's research assistant from 1996 to 2000.

Pollock said that in the week after Fackenheim's death in September 2003, he discovered some written evidence that Fackenheim may have changed his mind about central ideas in his post-Holocaust thinking.

Pollock pointed out that the central question of the philosopher's work was an examination of how "we as thinking humans confront what happened in the Holocaust. How can we take seriously what happened in the Holocaust and not despair of life and thought today?"

He explained that for years, Fackenheim held the view that the only way philosophy or religion or "thought" could make sense of the "incomprehensibility" of the Holocaust and "stay alive" was to look at the relationship between this "thought," and the resistance in "life" to the horror.

"'Thought' going to school with 'life,'" Pollock said, was the famous phrase Fackenheim coined to explain his core idea that the resistance to the Holocaust in "life" was a powerful mediator between "thought" and the otherwise unfathomable inhumanity of the Holocaust, and the only way for philosophy and religion to survive.

Pollock questioned whether Fackenheim in his later years might have begun to reconsider the primacy of "life" as the sole mediator for understanding the Holocaust.

In a brief interview, Pollock expressed great admiration for Fackenheim, recalling the first time he encountered him. He attended one of the professor's lectures 12 years ago as an undergraduate student in the junior-year-abroad program at Hebrew University, where Fackenheim was teaching. "It was the combination of intellectual rigour and sincere pathos that made him such an inspiring teacher," Pollock said.

He went on to become a graduate student in Hebrew U's department of Jewish thought and later had the opportunity to become well acquainted with Fackenheim as his research assistant.

"I was his sounding board," he joked. "That's how he introduced me. My sole job was to listen to Professor Fackenheim and repeat what he said back to him, so that he could question whether what he said made sense."

Pollock was a key organizer of a conference in Jerusalem held in 2001 in honour of Fackenheim's 85th birthday. "He certainly deserved the honour. It was a chance to pay tribute to him."

Pollock said his late mentor would probably have been "amused to see him in his old stomping ground" teaching some of the same courses he taught at the University of Toronto.

"I'm honoured to be teaching the kind of classes that he taught… He'd be amused by my giving this lecture."

Bubies and Zaidies perform to stay young at heart

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

If you ask the Bubies and Zaidies, a performing group of seniors ranging in age from age 65 to 92 who sing, dance and tell jokes, they'd tell you that age is only a number.

The group loves to entertain and make people happy, says Tom Weiss, who has been with the Bubies and Zaidies for 10 years.

"There is just something about the music that puts a smile on people's faces. It is very gratifying for me when I see the patients get up out of their chairs and dance or sing along. It brings back memories for them of when they were younger and with their loved ones," he says.

Fred Field, 83, who organized the group 15 years ago, is the director and master of ceremonies and is dedicated to entertaining the elderly.

"Despite the weather, we keep rehearsing and performing for seniors at retirement homes and other facilities," he says.

"I think the nice part is doing shows for retirement homes – particularly for shut-ins. That makes them happy and it makes us happy, too."

Weiss works closely with Field on the musical arrangements and plays the piano.

"I enjoy this group very much," says Weiss. "Fred and I do our own arrangements and then we try them out with the group."

The Bubies and Zaidies present one-hour musical entertainment programs throughout the Toronto area. This past year they performed at Pine Villa, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Terrace and Adult Day Care, Leisure World, Gibson Retirement Residence and Jewish Family Services.

> 'You just have to have the desire and the commitment'

Some of the performers have never had musical training or performed before they joined the group. They rehearse weekly in the auditorium of a seniors' residence on Bathurst Street at Lawrence Avenue.

"You don't even have to have talent," says Field. "You just have to have the desire and the commitment."

Their repertoire includes music mainly from the 1920s to the 1960s in English, Hebrew and Yiddish, and recently they have included some Russian songs.

The Bubies and Zaidies recently performed a life-cycle series of songs – from birth to old age. It included such favourites as Sonny Boy and The Bells Are Ringing for Me and My Gal.

"We feel like we are keeping the old songs alive," says Sam Day, 85, who has been singing with the group for many years. He adds that although he is more interested in the Yiddish and Hebrew music, "lately our group is performing more and more in English."

Anne Goldberg, who performed with the Zemer Chorale at the Beth Emeth Synagogue, has been with the Bubies and Zaidies for a year.

"I saw an announcement in the Canadian Jewish News and I decided to join the group," she says.

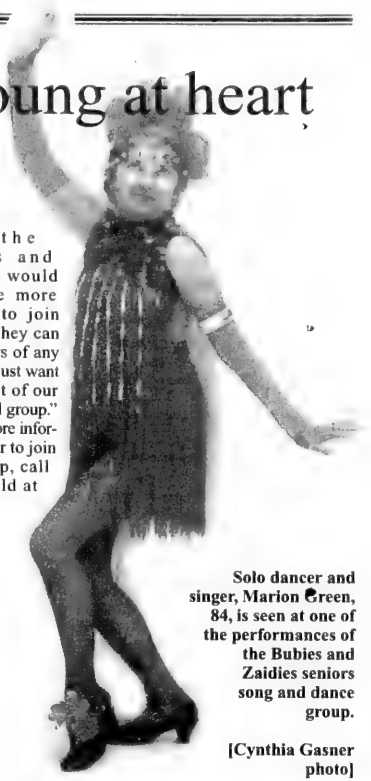
The group also features solo dancers Kittie Cohen, 92; Marion Green, 84; and Ruth Bleiwas, 75.

Ben Rosenberg, 87, the stage manager for five years, says, "I'm here because I like what I see and what I do with this group."

Others members are Murray Kay, Frank Goldblatt, Frank Harris, and Shirley Rosenfeld.

Field says the Bubies and Zaidies would welcome more seniors to join them. "They can be seniors of any age who just want to be part of our wonderful group."

For more information, or to join the group, call Fred Field at 416-633-2877.



Solo dancer and singer, Marion Green, 84, is seen at one of the performances of the Bubies and Zaidies seniors song and dance group.

Bayview Extendicare offers Jewish programs

Extendicare Bayview, a long-term care centre, has begun to offer a variety of Jewish programs in conjunction with the chaplaincy service of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS).

In addition to family Shabbat dinners and weekly services, the centre now offers such activities as Jewish cooking classes, Judaic arts and crafts, holiday celebrations, music, humour, Israeli folkdancing, news and discussion, Yiddish workshops and synagogue choir visits.

Diane Sweetzer, centre administrator, said that with about 52 Jewish residents, they felt it was time to fill a gap.

"We appreciate the importance of community, culture and tradition, and we wanted to meet the needs of our residents.

"Being able to participate in our Judaic programming makes them feel at home," she said.

Penny Edwards, a recreational therapist who has planned the programs, said that JF&CS chaplain, Rabbi Ronald Weiss, came in to speak to the staff about Jewish culture and tradition.

He also leads discussion groups with the residents, and a healing circle in which they talk about what it means to feel good and get rid of stress.

Edwards said the cooking classes have become a favourite activity. "They love to reminisce about the food. It often brings back happy memories for them, and by inviting family or friends to the the centre's monthly Shabbat dinners it enables them to continue their tradition of having company for Shabbat."

The centre has always offered a "third Passover seder," she said, but this year they are looking into running a first or second seder for isolated seniors in the community.

"There are people who have no family, and we want them to have somewhere to go. We want to open our doors to the community."

Edwards said they plan to enhance the Judaic programming, and forge some links with the community.

"We would like to see children's choirs come to perform, and we'd like our residents attend a students' mock seder."

For information on the programs call 416-226-1331 or e-mail cnh_bayview@extendicare.com.

Basson cooks traditional Israeli fare

By ROSIE SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

Moshe Basson is a man with a passion, whose love of food has earned him a reputation around the world. In celebration of Israel's 50th Independence Day, Basson, a resident of Jerusalem, was invited to give a cooking demonstration and prepare dinner for guests at the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C.

A few years ago, in a couscous competition in Sicily, Basson captured top honours over chefs from countries like Morocco and Algeria. The Iraqi-born Basson is the former owner and chef of the Eucalyptus, an eatery that was often on the itinerary of food lovers when they visited Jerusalem. It, like many other restaurants in Israel, was a casualty of the intifadah.

The first time I met Basson, almost a decade ago, I was given his name to research an article I was writing on the food of Israel. A quick visit was my game plan. Instead my husband and I sat mesmerized for hours as we listened to him tell of the indigenous culinary riches of Israel.

When I asked him to describe the food he prepares, he first answered, "It is somewhat innovative. Nobody else makes anything like it." Then he smiled and said, "Actually it's not. It's very old – thousands of years old."

While he has travelled the world, his source of inspiration comes from the Bible. His lamb dishes are seasoned with the same herbs as they were many centuries ago. As we talked, he snapped a pine cone and out came a nut for me to sample. When he prepares khubeiza, a green leafy vegetable, he tells the story of how the Jews of Jerusalem survived by foraging and eating the local greens during the siege of 1948.

He travels throughout the country to harvest wild herbs and is widely known as an expert on them. When Mediterranean cookbook guru Paula Wolfert came to Israel in search of material for a book on the greens of the Mediterranean, Basson was asked to take her exploring the countryside. On another visit, when I mentioned my upcoming trip through the north to the city of Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee, he told me to watch for the beautiful flowers of the herb, Jerusalem sage, which grows along the roadside.

But patrons also came to the restaurant to hear him talk about the historical origins of his fabulous fare.

While he is a wealth of fascinating information, Basson never stops learning about history, traditions and food. Recently, he took us on a tour through Machane Yehuda, the century-old market in Jerusalem. The bustling market is filled with shops that have been passed from generation to generation. Row upon row of fabulous displays of assorted seasonal fruits and vegetables are intermingled with shops selling all manner of fragrant spices, nuts and seeds, baked goods, fish, meat and poultry. As we explored the aisles, every few feet it seemed, someone stopped to talk to Basson.

Our first visit was to All For the Baker and Coffee Too, a new café and kitchenware shop opened by Basson's friend, Eli Mizrachi. Mizrachi had recently taken over a section of his father's 40-year-old spice and nut shop to serve bistro fare. While we had intended just to drop in and see the place, the aromas were so tempting that we made arrangements to return the next day for lunch. And what a lunch it was. We shared a few of the offerings – shakshuka, the Middle Eastern spicy egg and tomato dish, feather light gnocchi that could outdo any Italian eatery, a mushroom and blue cheese quiche and wonderful greens in a flavourful vinaigrette.

Our next stop was at the shop of Iraqi-born Roni Abu Najach. But it wasn't just the bins of unusual spices and herbs that Basson wanted us to see. Abu Najach provided us with various items based on traditional Iraqi folklore, such as certain spices for our pockets to ward off the evil eye. When Basson heard of one custom he wasn't familiar with, he wrote down all the details so that he could learn more about it later.

He's also still very involved in the food business, but his agenda has changed. Basson, like countless others, has struggled financially over the past few years. He has seen many residents of Jerusalem lose their jobs, just as he did – many of them had been regulars at his restaurant. Now some of these same people couldn't afford to eat at all. Basson searched for a way to combine his love of food and people and his desire to help.

The idea of Carmei Ha'ir was born – an eatery where he could prepare the dishes he was known for while allowing the unemployed to maintain their dignity. At lunchtime, patrons would pay according to their means. Some would pay the regular price while others would eat for free. But it was all very discreet. At night, the restaurant at 72 Agrippas St. was only opened for pre-arranged groups. Together with a few partners and backers, he made the restaurant a reality.

At the same time, the group recognized that others were going hungry at lunchtime. Schoolchildren whose families could always provide in the past now had nothing to eat at school. Carmei Ha'ir began a program where lunches would be delivered to the school for those who had none. But again, the maintaining of dignity was of prime importance. The bagged lunches, with no markings to identify their source, are picked up in the office by youngsters.

Basson is venturing into other culinary arenas. He's been working with groups for events at synagogues, churches and even private homes. He recently completed a series of cooking demonstrations and classes on foods of the Bible in the U.S. Midwest. Not only did the audiences get to see Basson creating his signature dishes like stuffed figs with onions and eggplant or maalubeh, a spectacular casserole dish of chicken, vegetables and rice, but while they dined on his specialties, they had the treat of listening to a person who captivates everyone he encounters.

SHAKSHUKA

2 tsp. olive oil
1 cup chopped onion
1 red pepper, diced
2 cups diced plum tomatoes
¼ tsp. ground cumin
salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste
3 or 4 eggs

Heat oil in a saucepan over medium high heat, add onion and sauté for 5 minutes or until soft. Add red pepper and continue to sauté another 5 minutes. Add tomatoes and cumin; stir to mix. Reduce heat to medium-low and cook covered for 20 minutes, stirring occasionally. Season to taste with salt and freshly ground pepper. Add the eggs and continue to cook, covered, until the eggs are set, about 4 minutes. Serve immediately. Serves 2.

Hamas in Damascus ordered shelling

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Three Palestinian groups were responsible for the mortar shelling and firing of Qassam rockets on Gush Katif last Thursday, although orders for the operation were issued by the Hamas leadership in Damascus.

Hamas fired mortars at the Gaza settlement in the morning, and as a show of solidarity at the request of Hamas, Islamic Jihad and a group from the Popular Resistance Committees joined in the fray.

Egypt and aides of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas telephoned the Hamas leadership in the Gaza Strip and were told that they did not order the shooting of mortars – a violation of the promise Abbas had made to Israel two days earlier at Sharm el-Sheikh.

The Hamas and Islamic Jihad leadership in Damascus resented the way Abbas declared a ceasefire as well as his refusal to attend a scheduled meeting with their leaders in Cairo. The issue of the ceasefire was to be clarified between Hamas leader Khaled Meshal and Islamic Jihad leader Abdullah Shalah, in their Cairo meeting with Abbas.

The two organizations said the declaration of a ceasefire that emerged from the Sinai resort contradicted their stance and that they had agreed only to a "calming" of the situation.

Abbas' office informed them that the meeting in Cairo would take place only after the Sharm el-Sheikh summit.

It is possible that the insult of Abbas' skipping the prearranged meeting and the early declaration of a ceasefire led the Hamas leadership abroad to order Thursday's attack.

Intelligence sources note that the assault by Hamas militants on the Basariyeh prison in Gaza that same day should also be regarded as part of the group's overall response to Abbas.

The attack on the prison was led by a Hamas militant, Marwan Isa, who has had a role in various terror attacks against Israel. Isa sought to settle a family score with three Fatah men held in prison, suspected of killing his relative, Ahmed Isa. The three were executed by Hamas militants, and the Palestinian Authority guards did nothing to stop them. The raiders also released all the prisoners being held in Gaza's main prison.

Following the raid, the shelling of the Gush Katif settlements began.

Hamas later said the shooting came in response to the killing of two Palestinians by the Israel Defence Forces. The IDF said one Palestinian was killed when five men approached the security fence near the settlement of Atzmona in the southern Gaza Strip in an attempt to cross it. The second Palestinian was killed when his own explosives exploded prematurely.

Abbas was furious with the Palestinian shelling. Israel perceives his reaction, the dismissal of senior officers in charge of security, as a positive development, indicative of his unwillingness to accept the chaotic security situation in Gaza.

In talks with Hamas representatives, Abbas informed them that violations of the ceasefire will be dealt with by the PA.

In Israel, the decision was taken not to respond to the shelling on Gush Katif but wait for Abbas to handle the violation. A recent meeting between former Palestinian security chief Mohammed Dahlan and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz earlier this week is likely to play a role in Israel's actions.

A step toward reforming the PA

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

The dismissal of Palestinian security officers last Thursday was the first step by Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas in his effort to restore law and order in the Gaza Strip. However, the dramatic move, accompanied by an announcement of a state of emergency among the Palestinian security forces, raises many questions: How many were dismissed? What is the precise reason for the dismissal of each one? Moreover, does Abbas have a clear security plan?

In most of the media, both in Israel and abroad, the standard reason given for the dismissals is the Palestinian failure to prevent the firing of more than 50 mortar shells at Gush Katif settlements.

The shooting occurred a mere two days following the excited announcement of an end to violence at the Sharm el-Sheikh summit. Hamas spokesmen announced that their militants bombed Gush Katif, not to challenge Abbas' authority or to undermine the ceasefire, but in response to the IDF killing of Ibrahim Abu-Jazzer from Rafah.

But the media mentioned another reason, perhaps more important, for the dismissals: an armed raid on the central prison in Gaza on Thursday. A group of 50 armed men blew up the prison's gate, fired their guns, wounded guards and entered the cells. There, they executed two prisoners suspected of murder. They then kidnapped another prisoner, also suspected of murder, and killed him in the Bureij refugee camp, in front of the home of the family seeking revenge.

This clearly military-style assault was carried out by dozens of members of a private militia in Bureij. There are many such militias in the Gaza Strip, and it isn't the first time they have raided the Gaza prison, while the guards fear to stand in their way.

The Palestinian media stressed this reason for the dismissals because it symbolizes the security chaos in the Gaza Strip.

In one case, that of the daily Al-Ayyam, the main headline combined the two events in explaining the dismissals: Some commanders and officers were dismissed because of the attack on the Gaza prison and the mortar shelling. A senior source in Ramallah explained yesterday that while the two events are unrelated, both are good examples of the lax order in Gaza.

How is a reliable security structure created to counter the private militias and the armed gangs?

The National Security Council of the PA has a detailed plan that includes a decision to retire security officers who reach the age of 60. This amounts to nearly 1,000 people. In other words, Abbas, supported by his close security aides, Nasser Yussuf, Mohammed Dahlan and Jibril Rajoub, are planning to do away with the old guard and rebuild it from scratch.

Therefore, the dismissals last week are the first step in a long road of rebuilding the PA, which will include a new government that is expected to be presented to the Palestinian Legislative Council this week.

Various sources suggest that PA prime minister, Ahmed Qureia, will have two deputies: Salem Fayad, currently the finance minister, and Nabil Sha'ath, who will be responsible for contact with the "Road Map" quartet of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations. Mohammed Shatyah will head the finance ministry and the foreign minister will be Nasser al-Kidwa, current Palestine Liberation Organization ambassador at the UN.

Chirac rejects Israeli request to add Hezbollah to EU terror list

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — French President Jacques Chirac rebuffed Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom's request to add the militant Hezbollah organization to the European Union's list of terror organizations.

During a meeting with Shalom on Monday afternoon, Chirac said France's efforts in the coming weeks will be focused primarily on the democratic process in Lebanon and the upcoming elections to be held in two months. Shalom made the request during a meeting with his French counterpart Michel Barnier earlier this month.

The EU will hold an initial discussion on the Israeli request, which is based on the danger posed by Hezbollah to new Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas.

Both Israeli and Palestinian sources have accused Hezbollah of trying to organize Palestinian attacks on Israelis in order to torpedo the ceasefire understandings reached between Abbas and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon at Sharm el-Sheikh earlier this month.

France has played the primary role in blocking the addition of Hezbollah to the EU list to date. Shalom asked France to use its influence in the Arab world to help promote better relations between Israel and Persian Gulf and North African nations.

Speaking after a meeting with Chirac, Shalom said France could also play "a key role" in isolating groups set on disrupting peace efforts between Israelis and Palestinians. "I asked the assistance of President Chirac to help us to have better relations with North African countries and the Gulf states, and bring his influence among those countries in order to have better understanding between Israel [and those nations]," Shalom said.

Shalom also said he was "very encouraged" by the French government's recent efforts to crack down on anti-Semitism, and its "determination" to curb the activities of right-wing extremists.

Telephone call (1)

The day after the Sharm el-Sheikh summit, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon phoned Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak to thank him for hosting the summit. Sharon repeated his invitation to Mubarak to visit Israel.

Telephone call (2)

Jordan's King Abdullah II, phoned Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to congratulate him on the Sharm el-Sheikh summit. The King said that Sharon's speech was very important and added that the summit gives hope to the entire region and was a source of pride to its participants and their peoples.

Envoys will return

Egypt and Jordan agreed to return their ambassadors to Israel, but did not say when. The envoys were withdrawn in 2000 after the outbreak of the intifadah. The decision was announced at the Sharm el-Sheikh summit. Israeli officials were disappointed no implementation date was given.

Bombing prevented

Israeli soldiers operating in Nablus arrested a Palestinian man suspected of planning a suicide bus bombing in Jerusalem's French Hill area in the near future. He was carrying a handgun and two fragmentation grenades when he was arrested.

Security chief named

Israel named a replacement for outgoing Shin Bet director Avi Dichter. Yuval Diskin, a 27-year veteran of the domestic security service with extensive experience fighting Palestinian terror, will take over from Dichter when he retires in May, the Prime Minister's Office said. Diskin, 49, was chosen over Dichter's deputy, who now plans to resign. Shin Bet sources said Diskin is charismatic and capable of thinking in strategic terms, which is key for an organization that deals with minute-to-minute events in the field. Israeli pundits speculate that Dichter will enter politics when he steps down from the security service.

Sharansky: Egypt centre of anti-Semitism

Egypt is the global centre of anti-Semitism, Natan Sharansky said. The Israeli cabinet minister, who heads a government task force on anti-Semitism, told a U.S. Congressional lunch in his honour last week that more anti-Semitic tracts are published in Egypt than anywhere else. "Egypt today is the centre of world anti-Semitism," he said, expounding on his thesis that dictatorial regimes create outside enemies to distract their people from their real plight and Egypt's rulers have made theirs the Jews. "More [copies of] Protocols of the Elders of Zion are published in Egypt than in any other country in the world," Sharansky said.

Pettigrew senses 'fundamental change' in region

I am confident, having discussed this matter with Prime Minister Sharon, that Israel intends to fulfill all of its commitments under the provisions of the 'road map' [peace plan], which includes a reference to the implementation of [UN Security Council] Resolution 242 [calling for Israeli withdraw from territories in the West Bank in exchange for peace]."

Pettigrew said Canada has a "unique" role in the region, and will pledge expertise in a variety of areas, including border control and the judiciary.

One of the highlights of his trip was the announcement of a gift of $750,000 worth of medical supplies to Hebron's Mohammad Ali-Ahtassaeb Hospital.

The gift was made on behalf of Canada's Jewish community and funded by businessman Walter Arbib of Toronto. It was reportedly received enthusiastically by Abbas and his officials.

Pettigrew also announced a new initiative to support human rights reform and good governance in the Palestinian Authority. The project is intended to advance a model of judicial education and will be funded through a $100,000 grant from the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA).

Three Canadian judges will take part: Douglas Campbell of the Federal Court, retired Supreme Court Judge Claire L'Heureux Dubé and Catherine Fraser, chief justice of Alberta.

Despite those moves, Pettigrew was taken to task by the Canada-Israel Committee and B'nai Brith Canada for laying a wreath on the grave of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat. Both groups said they found the gesture offensive and disappointing.

Asked whether he was pressed by Israeli foreign minister Silvan Shalom to privately convey to Palestinian leaders the importance of shutting down Qassam rocket factories, collecting illegal weapons from civilians and halting arms smuggling across the Egyptian border, Pettigrew said he would have raised those issues without being asked.

"The rocket factories, the incitement, arms smuggling, these all must stop. I found it encouraging that the Palestinians recognized the need for action on all these fronts. They have demonstrated their commitment to action by deploying their police forces throughout Gaza and the West Bank and by dismissing those who fail to prevent attacks. No clearer signal could be sent at this stage."

But he added that "there are also actions that Israel needs to take to make its contribution to security and peace in the region and to support President Abbas in his serious efforts to deal with terror."

Pierre Pettigrew meeting in Jerusalem last week with his counterpart Israel Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom.

Asked whether he is satisfied that Abbas is in a position to rein in extremists, Pettigrew said the Palestinian leader "certainly has demonstrated in the last few weeks that determination to take action against violence and extremism. Whether he manages to restrain all violent rejectionist elements through good diplomacy remains to be seen, but he has already demonstrated his willingness to act decisively."

As for concrete signs from Palestinian leaders that they are serious peace partners, Pettigrew said Abbas has been working "systematically" with rejectionist factions to deal immediately with terror and security.

"In addition, he has also taken steps to deal with incitement in the official Palestinian media. These are the actions of someone who truly wants to be a peace partner. My Israeli contacts told me that they already sense a difference in the atmosphere."

Meanwhile, he said, "Israel has also taken some measures consistent with its own obligations, including with respect to freedom of movement and Gaza workers' access to Israel, redeployment out of West Bank cities, and other significant political gestures that will contribute to mutual trust, such as progress in preparations for withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the northern West Bank."

Pettigrew said he expressed concern to Israeli officials that Israel intends to strengthen its hold on eastern Jerusalem.

"I told Prime Minister Sharon and Foreign Minister Shalom that Canada believes that the status of Jerusalem can only be decided as part of final status negotiations between the parties. In the meantime, Canada calls on Israel to refrain from any action which might prejudice the outcome of those negotiations, including the construction of a barrier within the city of Jerusalem, [and] property confiscation and demolition."

Asked to comment on reports that Canada pledged to help rehabilitate refugee camps in Gaza after Israel's withdrawal, Pettigrew said Canada has worked on the refugee issue since the early 1990s as the gavel holder for multilateral talks on Palestinian refugees.

"Our approach is designed to find just and practical ways to deal with the plight of Palestinian refugees. This includes contributing to efforts to improve their well-being in terms of living conditions, health, education and employment as well as preparing the ground for political solutions. In this regard, we have joined with others in the international community in supporting an UNRWA-led program to rehabilitate refugee housing and communities in northern Syria."

Asked if he got a sense from Israeli officials that there will be stiff opposition to withdrawal from Gaza and some settlements, Pettigrew said "the outside world lacks a clear understanding of the intensity of the debates and the depths of emotion within Israel on this issue. I am, however, confident that Sharon will implement his withdrawal decision this year… Withdrawal is the route back to the road map."

Pettigrew ended his trip on a down note while visiting Beirut, where he called on Syria and Lebanon to support fledgling efforts at Mideast peace by reining in Hezbollah guerillas based in Lebanon. The message did not sit well his Lebanese hosts.

After telling a news conference that Hezbollah must give Abbas a chance to make a deal with Israel, Lebanese Foreign Minister Mahmoud Hammoud walked out, abruptly ending the gathering.

Violent attacks on British Jews hit record high

A few days earlier, vandals daubed swastikas and other Nazi symbols on 10 gravestones in a Jewish cemetery in Aldershot, in southern England, the second time it had been targeted.

Britain's chief rabbi, Jonathan Sacks, said the figures are cause for concern. "The single most important thing is for our community to enlist others to join in the protest against the attacks," he said in a statement.

"Jews must not be left to fight anti-Semitism alone."

The government described the rise as "totally unacceptable" and said action is being taken.

"We have strengthened the law against racism, including raising the maximum penalty for incitement to racial hatred," the leader of the House of Commons, Peter Hain, told parliament.

The leaders of Britain's Anglican and Catholic Christian communities said the findings were disturbing and condemned anti-Semitism.

Rob Beckley, the Association of Chief Police Officers' spokesperson on faith matters, said "any anti-Semitic incidents are a matter of great concern to the police service… All hate crime is insidious and destructive and we are committed to taking positive action against those perpetrating such offences."

Bio-Fly vs. the Mediterranean menace

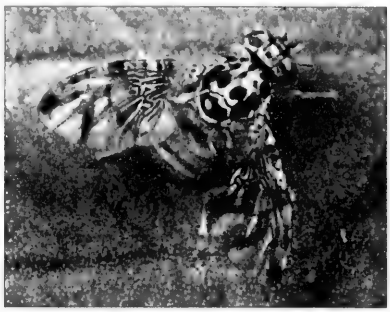
By ELI STUTZ
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — The fruit fly is small, has many offspring and is the number one enemy of fruit.

Bio-Fly, an Israeli-based company, is mobilizing to fight the crop-killer by sterilizing it with a radiation machine produced by Nordion, a Canadian company.

For years, fruit flies have caused billions of dollars worth of damage to crops worldwide. The popular method of fighting this pest is to spray crops with Malathion, a chemical that is harmful to people and the environment.

The new way of controlling the population of the flies was developed by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and Bio-Bee, an Israeli company from the Kibbutz Sde Eliyahu known for its expertise on environmentally friendly pest control.



The Med-fly

Bio-Fly, the company born out of this partnership, plans to use the method called Sterile Insect Technique (SIT), which involves exposing male fruit flies to radiation to sterilize them. The neutered males will be released, mate with females, but won't produce offspring. After a number of generations, the fruit fly population will decline and entire crops will be saved.

Bio-Fly's director of marketing, Dael Levy, says there's been one hitch on the way to launching the project: the radiation machine itself.

"Israel doesn't have a large enough machine to cope with the amount of [Mediterranean] flies that need to be irradiated. We found a suitable machine from a Canadian company called Nordion, but we're still short of the funds needed to purchase it," he says.

Levy is hopeful that this obstacle will soon be surmounted.

IAEA plans to use this method in various regions around the world, but will test it in Israel first. Bio-Fly is preparing to use SIT on the Mediterranean fruit fly, the Med-fly, which has plagued Israeli crops for decades.

Bio-Fly intends to begin irradiating the flies at the Hadassah Medical Center in Jerusalem and release them into the Arava and Huleh valley regions, where the problem is especially severe.

If the project proves a success, Bio-Fly plans to co-operate with neighbouring countries also hoping to control the fruit fly population.

Shimon Steinberg, head of research and development at Bio-Fly, explains that the Med-fly damages fruit in two ways.

"The female fly inserts her eggs into the fruit. The eggs then hatch and the larvae eat the fruit from within. Then, so-called 'secondary pests' enter the wound in the fruit, rendering it inedible," he says.

Steinberg emphasizes that the economic loss is twofold.

"The first damage is direct – the loss of the crop. But there's an indirect loss, as well. Countries like Japan, that have managed to stay free of the fruit fly, will boycott produce from countries like Israel, which have not.

"Israel has had to deal with the Med-fly for over 40 years," says Steinberg, "but using Malathion spray to combat the pest is far from ideal. It's an organic phosphate that causes nerve damage to all warm-blooded animals, including human beings, and any exposure to high dosages is extremely dangerous."

Steinberg notes that citrus fruits, which are especially attractive to the Med-fly, are sprayed regularly, often not far from urban areas, and that a direct draft from the direction of the orchards poses a threat to nearby residents.

Bio-Fly hopes to eliminate this threat this summer. "This June, Bio-Fly will begin to implement SIT, initially mass-producing 15 million sterile male Med-flies per week. Bio-Fly will release the males into the Arava and Huleh valley regions by plane," Steinberg says.

He is optimistic that the irradiated males will compete with untreated males.

"The genetic strain we've imported from Vienna under the auspices of the IAEA has no reduced libido and is just as competitive as the wild male as far as mating is concerned," he says.

Steinberg is also hopeful that Bio-Fly's use of SIT will gradually eradicate the Med-fly. In response to fears that this method may cause the extinction of a species, Steinberg says it won't happen.

"Just look at your backyard. If you have a guava or citrus tree, it's a potential host for the Med-fly. So there will always be places where the Med-fly can exist. But the objective is to keep their numbers as low as possible, opening up export possibilities for Israel that are currently out of the question."

Bandage invented by IDF medic saves lives in Iraq

By VARDA SPIEGEL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

An innovative new bandage invented by a U.S.-born Israeli combat medic is already saving the lives of American soldiers in Iraq.

Inventor Bernard Bar-Natan, who immigrated to Israel from New York City, gained his knowledge of wound dressing in the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF), where he has served since 1983.

Bar-Natan's "Emergency Bandage," which stops potentially fatal bleeding and can also be used as a sling, incorporates a new approach the U.S. military has adopted to treating its wounded.

In the past, injured soldiers were usually evacuated, but the Americans now believe that immediate treatment on the battlefield saves lives.

Using the improvised technique of placing a rock onto a bandage to keep pressure on a wound as a model, the elasticized bandage has a pad and a pressure bar that allows soldiers to wrap the wound once, twist the bandage, and rewrap the wound in the opposite direction.

Rewrapping is particularly useful in bandaging complex injuries to the groin or head.

Soldiers in Iraq are currently trained to treat their own wounds before help arrives. Wounded soldiers can apply the Emergency Bandage themselves, using only one hand if necessary.

The Jerusalem-based First Care Products start-up, founded by Bar-Natan, sold nearly 200,000 Emergency Bandages to the U.S. military in 2003, and 800,000 last year.

The Canadian military, the French army and the Belgian army have also bought what Americans are now calling "the Israeli Bandage."

In addition to its military applications, the bandage has been used by civilian emergency-care providers and hospitals around the world.

First Care Products hopes to sell the Emergency Bandage to the IDF sometime in the future.

Urologist builds prostate cancer research empire

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — "Building must be in my blood," jokes Dr. Larry Goldenberg, who comes from a family in which three generations have worked in the construction industry.

Rather than join them, though, he got involved with a different kind of construction: that of building a fortress of research into prostate cancer.

A self-confessed workaholic, Goldenberg, 51, was the driving force behind the development of the Prostate Centre at Vancouver General Hospital, a $91 million facility that is the largest of its kind in Canada. A Toronto-born and educated urologist who moved to Vancouver in 1979, he is committed to researching the causes and manifestations of prostate disease and finding a cure.

In 1990, Goldenberg wrote the first book – now in its third edition – for patients suffering from prostate cancer. And he developed the Vancouver Prostate Education Resource Centre, where patients can obtain information on the disease in the form of books, videos and pamphlets, and from an interactive work station. A full-time nurse-scientist, who specializes in patient information, staffs the centre. "I've always felt it was important for patients to understand what's going on," Goldenberg says.

Laurence Klotz, a urologist at Toronto's Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Science Centre, says that "Larry has created a research empire in prostate cancer that is unique in terms of its size and productivity in Canada and in the world.

"It's a team effort and as the leader of the team, he gets the credit for recruiting outstanding scientists and researchers and putting these phenomenal people together."

Goldenberg wears many hats, among them doctor, administrator, researcher, facilitator, academic, educator and fundraiser. As a surgeon with a busy practice, the head of the University of British Columbia Division of Urology and the head of the Prostate Centre at Vancouver General Hospital, his days are long. Often, they start at 7 a.m. with meetings, and include performing hours of surgery, administering a busy medical department, and giving guidance to medical residents and information to his patients.

Goldenberg's patients say he is a caring, highly skilled physician. One of his patients, some 15 years ago, was prominent Vancouver businessman Jimmy Pattison. Pattison was struck by Goldenberg's work ethic and passion to succeed. So much so that in 1998, when Goldenberg was raising funds to support his research and build the Vancouver Prostate Centre, Pattison was among those who rallied to his cause, giving Goldenberg a gift of a whopping $20 million over seven years.

This year, Goldenberg's goal is to get a four-armed robot capable of removing cancerous prostate glands for the Prostrate Centre. If he is able to raise $3 million, the da Vinci Surgical Robot will be installed at the Vancouver General Hospital, making it one of only 12 teaching hospitals in the world to have one.

For surgeons, the robot adds greater magnification and improves dexterity during the delicate operation, which enhances its surgical accuracy. For patients, the robot means smaller incisions, faster recoveries, reduced pain after the operation and reduced blood loss.

"I'm determined to do what I can to bring that robot to Vancouver," says Goldenberg. "Getting this robot here will present a challenge not just in funding, but in its operationalization… I'm determined to make it happen.

"My team and I are hoping to take a disease that can be deadly, turn it into a chronic illness, hopefully cure it and ultimately prevent it. If I reach this goal, I will really feel that all the effort was worthwhile."

Rabbi/psychotherapist gives parenting tips

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Parenting is definitely a learnable skill, says rabbi and psychotherapist Tzvi Hersh Weinreb.

"No one is born a good parent; it is a skill that can be taught by experts," he said at a panel discussion following a positive Jewish parenting conference co-sponsored by Torah in Motion, the Orthodox Union and the Yetta Nashman Jewish Family Institute.

It is a goal-oriented teaching process, he said, "because there has to be an objective. Whether [we want our children] to turn out like [us] or opposite to [us], we all have some notion, consciously or unconsciously, of what we are trying to produce."

Parents need to make their goals explicit early on, he said. "Parents [don't want] their kids to be geniuses or the best athletes. They want them to be mensches. That is a goal, and to reach that goal parents must be teachers.

"You are a role model, and you teach best by example. To be a good parent, you must be a good person."

It does not happen instantly, said Rabbi Weinreb. "Parenting is a lifelong process, and Jewish parenting must be done within a religious framework.

"The essence of our religion is being a parent. Judaism is about the transfer of faith from grandparent to parent to child. The most important Jewish institute is the family," he said.

"A Jewish child must know they have a home to which the door is always open. It is a sanctuary and a shelter no matter what."

Children also need to learn a sense of pride of being part of the Jewish people, he said. "It is important for a child to develop a relationship with God, and have a sense that they can turn to God."

Rabbi Weinreb said that children learn best from imperfect models, not superheros. "It is wonderful to be a master of everything, but it is fine [for you and your children to take your journey of learning] together."

Rona Novick, a psychologist, added that parents are constantly growing and changing. "We cannot teach children by [displaying] opposite behaviour. We don't have to be perfect, but we must look at our behaviour."

With regards to adolescents, said Norman Blumenthal, a clinical psychologist, "the key is to preserve the relationship. When a normal issue conflicts with mitzvah observance, parents have to make a judgment call. [They have to decide what to insist upon.] If you get into a power struggle, you could be throwing out the baby with the bath water."

Screenwriter makes his seraphic vision a reality

The Hebrew Kid and the Apache Maiden*, by Robert J. Avrech, Seraphic Press.

By PEARL SABAN
Special to The CJN

Robert J. Avrech's primary experience has been as a screenwriter. With Brian DePalma, he wrote the screenplay for the 1984 thriller Body Double, and he was the screenwriter for the 1992 film, A Stranger Among Us, an official selection of the Cannes Film Festival. His moving 1999 adaptation of author Jane Yolen's The Devil's Arithmetic garnered him an Emmy Award.

Robert J. Avrech

Avrech recently undertook a new venture – to write a novel for young adults that would reflect the values of an observant Jew.

His guiding light was his son, Ariel Chaim, a yeshiva student, gentle, deeply religious, devoted to his parents, his younger sisters and his studies. Ariel also loved both classic and modern literature, but was concerned about the values found in contemporary young adult literature, which he felt reflected the point of view of cynical authors and editors determined to impose their negative viewpoint on others.

He suggested that his father "start a publishing company, publish fiction that is of the highest quality, yet also suitable for kids who hold Torah values."

At age 14, Ariel was diagnosed with a brain tumour. His family rallied around him as he underwent intensive chemotherapy and radiation treatments, transfusions and surgery.

For the eight years that he was in and out of hospital, family, faith and friendships sustained him in his fight to survive. He continued to study and was valedictorian of his graduating class at Los Angeles' Yeshiva Gedolah. Four years later, however, in fall 2002, Ariel had difficulty breathing. The prognosis was that the chemotherapy for his tumour had left his lungs scarred. He was suffering from pulmonary fibrosis and needed a lung transplant.

By this time, Avrech had begun writing a Jewish historical novel, The Hebrew Kid and the Apache Maiden. His goal was to share his "love of Judaism, Jewish ritual and Jewish history with as many people as possible." He wanted to be a positive influence, telling a great story that also embraced Orthodox Jewish ideals.

The Hebrew Kid and the Apache Maiden is the coming-of-age story of the unlikely friendship between Ariel, "The Hebrew Kid," and Lozen, an Apache warrior girl and younger sister of Victorio, who was perhaps the greatest Apache chief in the Old West. Ariel, an intelligent, serious and spunky boy of almost bar mitzvah age, is determined to celebrate this important ceremony.

He becomes friends with Lozen, as he and his observant Jewish family make their way across the Arizona Territory after the Civil War, seeking a life free of oppression, a place where they can practise their religion and livelihood.

Through their adventures and intriguing friendship, Ariel and Lozen learn about the similarities and the differences in their cultures.

The story's colourful characters include Papa, Mama, sister Rebecca, Victorio, U.S. cavalry, scalp hunters, settlers and the renowned Doc Holliday, all travelling westward to find a new beginning. With its page-turning suspense, adventure, humour, historical and religious references, and its glossary of Yiddish and Hebrew terms, The Hebrew Kid and the Apache Maiden is a welcome and wonderful book for anyone age nine to 120. It is a literary treasure for families to read and reread.

Avrech spent two years researching Apache life, the westward expansion and letters and journals of Jews who made the migration to the west. He travelled to Arizona, where the story takes place, to get a feel for the land and to talk to Apache tribe members.

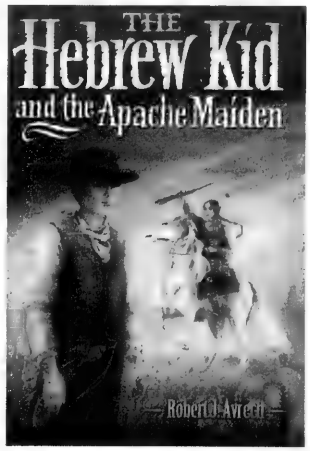
While Ariel remained hospitalized or homebound, Avrech read him the manuscript, discussing story lines, characterization and halachic accuracies. He says his son was "a fine literary critic, and after he read a chapter, it was not unusual for Ariel to offer gentle but cogent criticism that would send me back to my pages for numerous rewrites.

"My years as a screenwriter have taught me some basic lessons in telling a good story, getting to the heart of the scene quickly and resolving characters and situations."

Avrech completed seven drafts of the book, "each one better than the next," with further input from family, friends, rabbis, writers and editors.

Unfortunately, Ariel did not receive the lung transplant he and his family were desperately hoping for, and in July 2003, he died at age 22. Avrech and his wife, Karen, decided to establish Seraphic Press in Ariel's memory. Seraphim, God's first order of angels, are often mentioned in the Torah. Ariel's pious nature was recognized early by his family, friends and community, making Seraphic Press a befitting name.

The outstanding Seraphic Press design team includes Obadinah Heavner, illustrator; Robert Lanphear, book designer; and Iskra, calligrapher. Jonathan David Publishers, Inc. has been signed on as exclusive distributor for The Hebrew Kid and upcoming Seraphic Press books whose release dates will coincide with National Jewish Book Month.



The publishing list includes more titles in The Hebrew Kid series – Avrech is currently working on The Hebrew Kid and Buffalo Bill, a story about bringing a Torah to Tombstone, Ariz. The Shidduch Diaries, designated as "chick lit for the observant," is author Michael Levin's wildly entertaining look at the insular Jewish dating scene. Maccabee and Me, another Avrech title, features a time-travel story about a high school student who learns to appreciate his Judaism when he is cast back into the world of Judah the Maccabee.

The Hebrew Kid and the Apache Maiden, recently released, received wonderful reviews. In November 2004, Avrech was invited to read and sign copies of his book at the largest Jewish children's book fair in Los Angeles. But he said then: "HaShem has a wicked curveball. The bookfest takes place 100 yards from Ariel's kever [grave]. Understand, this is The Hebrew Kid's very first public appearance."

In May 2004, Avrech started a blog, an online journal – Seraphic Secret, www.seraphicpress.com – his space to remember his only son, Ariel.

Robert J. Avrech translated his son's vision into the Avrech family's vision, Seraphic Press, whose motto is "belief in books."

The Hebrew Kid and the Apache Maiden is available at www.amazon.com and at www.barnesandnoble.com, in Toronto at Negev Books and at Israel's Books and Gifts, and in Montreal at Rodal's and Kotel Books.

Jazz violinist, 85, records his legacy for posterity

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Special to The CJN

Harvey Tishcoff's fingers are long and slender and they possess the power to coax sweet music out of his violin.

These days the 85-year-old jazz violinist likes to keep his life quiet and unassuming. But it was not always so.

His career has been about the beautiful sound that he can conjure up on his five-string electric fiddle. He has serenaded high-profile people like Golda Meir, Abba Eben, Itzhak Rabin and the Reichmann family.

For over 60 years, Tishcoff has successfully plied his atypical musical trade (five-string violinists were rare because the extra string adds a confusing dimension to the instrument).

As one of the pioneers of the five-string electric violin, he naturally drew attention from jazz industry insiders when he was just a boy.

"The two things I had going for me were that I was able to improvise and also that I was on the ground floor in getting into electronic violin," says Tishcoff.

But, the attention was not always positive. He was initially scorned by his peers for being too daring. They soon changed their tune after learning that legendary jazz violinist Joe Venuti had taken Tishcoff under his wing.

"All of a sudden I'm getting phone calls from people who wouldn't even say, 'Hello' to me before," Tishcoff says with a grin.

Over the years, he has been asked to play with the Toronto Symphony and with celebrities like Luciano Pavarotti, Tony Bennett, Bob Hope, Stan Getz, Danny Kaye and Glen Campbell. Never one to pass up a gig, he has also played with the Ice Capades and for a German beer advertisement.

The son of Russian immigrants, Tishcoff was born and raised in Kensington, in Toronto. He studied at the Royal Conservatory of Music but decided to leave his classical training behind at an early age to play popular music to earn a living.

"At 15 or 16 years old I did my first gig. I never finished high school," he says. "The depression was horrible. We were all in bad shape. I had the chance to go out and help my family with my violin. So I went commercial to make money."

Remarkably, it is only now that Tishcoff is cutting his own record – something he has never done in his many years as a musician.

Inspired by his recent birthday celebration and his 64-year wedding anniversary to his wife Lily, he felt the time had finally come to chronicle his work so that his family would always have a piece of him. The album, aptly titled Legacy is scheduled for release in April.

Peers in the music industry volunteered their time to make this album a reality. JUNO award-winning clarinetist Bob DeAngelis took time off his busy schedule to contribute, as well.

Robin Langdon, a professional musician and co-producer of Legacy, organized the sessions and was astounded at Tishcoff's professionalism and virtuosity.

"He did a three-and-a-half hour session and only needed one take per song," said Langdon. "If I can do this when I am his age, I'll be happy."

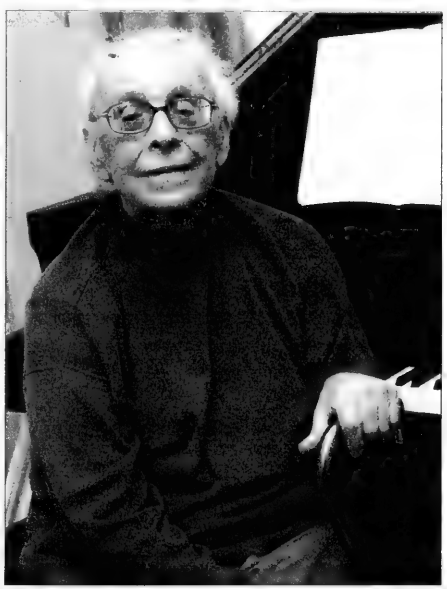
Legacy will consist of a collection of some of Tishcoff's favourite songs and genres from jazz standards like Our Love is Here to Stay and klezmer like Bei mir bist du shein, as well as some cherished chassidic nigunim (wordless songs).

Tishcoff responded humbly to all the recent attention to his work. "I feel highly flattered. If people in my profession have nice things to say about me, then I can't get any greater compliment. It means my life was worthwhile because they recognized me," he said.

Tishcoff still practices almost every day. Though diminishing eyesight has slightly hampered his ability to read musical passages, he perseveres.

"I still love it," he says. "When my time comes and they put me away, I want them to put this with me," he says, pointing to his violin. Until then, he will go on playing, much to the delight of audiences everywhere.

A concert is planned in the spring. For information regarding the CD release party please contact rlangdon@rogers.com or call 416-783-8700.



Harvey Tishcoff feels the time has finally come to chronicle his work so his family would always have a piece of him.

KING DAVID BEING STAGED AT WINTER GARDEN

Jason Allen

Michele Tredger

Torontonians have a singular opportunity to see King David, a stage musical by former Montrealer Eyal Bitton, in a production sponsored by Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

King David features a cast of 16 players performing 27 musical numbers and dance sequences. Some of the costumes and sets are new and some are borrowed from two previous productions in Montreal in 2002 and 2003.

Veteran actors Jason Allen and Michele Tredger play the lead roles of David and Bathsheba. The choreographer is Faye Rauw and the director is Bitton himself.

Having extensively revised the show after each of its incarnations, Bitton focused on particular aspects of the biblical narrative in order to heighten the drama and compress the tale into two hours of stage time.

"I chose to tell the story of David's journey into adulthood – his transformation from hero to king – and highlight the love triangle between David, Michal and Bathsheba," he said.

"I was interested in discovering the man and his soul… He's a man who is searching and yearning for affection and acceptance. I thought that was a fundamental truth about his character."

The musical also addresses David's spiritual faith, "but not too much because I don't want it to be a Bible show or a forum for pontification or preaching," he said.

The cast begins full daily rehearsals this week, two and a half weeks in advance of the performance. "The six leads have been in the show before, so they're not learning their parts from scratch," he said.

Bitton, who moved to Toronto two years ago, is a principal in Kahina Productions and choir director at Beth Tikvah. A composer of sacred choral music, the 34-year-old has written numerous other shows including Moses The Musical Saga, which was performed at Montreal's Saidye Bronfman Centre last year. He also wrote lyrics for a musical version of Mordecai Richler's The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz that played at the same venue in 1997.

"This is my first production in Toronto and I'm very excited about it," he said of the current project. "We're mounting it for one night only because these things are expensive and risky. This is a good way to try out the show on a Toronto audience and get a buzz going. Hopefully, we'll remount it."

Winter Garden Theatre. 189 Yonge St. $72, $54, $36. Monday, March 7, 8 p.m. Order tickets from Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 416-221-3433.

Mooredale Does Mozart: Written in 1790, the year before he died, Mozart's String Quintet in D Major was one of his last great instrumental works. It is "highly introspective, enigmatic and expressive in an otherworldly way," according to cellist Kristine Bogyo, artistic director of Mooredale Concerts, which presents offerings by Mozart, Ravel and Chopin in two upcoming concerts.

Performers include violinists Erika Raum and Catherine Cosbey, and violists Sharon Wei and Yosef Tamir. Educated in Russia, Israel and Toronto, Tamir was recently appointed assistant principal viola of the Kitchener-Waterloo Symphony Orchestra. He is also a member of the Tokai String Quartet and has collaborated in chamber music with Pinchas Zukerman.

Names in the News: Actor Alon Nashman has joined the cast of the Modern Times production of Macbeth that runs March 9 to 27 at the Theatre Centre, 1087 Queen St. W. Tickets are $15 to $25, with a PWYC matinee on Sundays (416-504-7529)… MathJamK, an innovative math-curriculum music CD by children's performers Judy and David, has been nominated for a 2005 Juno in the category of best children's album. The popular duo perform PigMania at the Vaughan City Playhouse Theatre, March 12 to 15 (905-882-SHOW)… Son of the Mask, a new film by Lawrence Guterman (Cats and Dogs), opens this week. A former Torontonian, the 41-year-old Studio City-based producer is the son of Blema Mazin and stepfather Monty Mazin of Toronto… Winnipeg-based media mogul Leonard Asper, CEO of CanWest, which recently purchased the Jerusalem Post and the Jerusalem Report magazine with an Israeli partner, is reportedly embroiled in a power struggle over control of same; both sides have agreed to submit the dispute to arbitration. "Business analysts predicted that eventually one partner would buy out the other," the London Jewish Chronicle reported on Jan. 28.

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2005 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, March 4, 2005. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 11, 2005.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 24, 2005. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

CHURCHILL MUSEUM OPENS IN LONDON

Jews have a special affinity for Sir Winston Churchill, the British bulldog who opposed Hitler with prescient tenaciousness in the 1930s and engaged the Nazis in fierce and unrelenting combat from 1939 to 1945.

The 40th anniversary of the wartime leader's death is being marked with a new museum that opened in London last week. The Churchill Museum is the first in the world dedicated to the life, achievements and legacy of the man who, according to a BBC poll, was "the greatest Briton who ever lived."

The $30-million project is the final component in the expansion of the underground Cabinet War Rooms in Whitehall, from which Churchill led the British and Allied war effort. His private living accommodation were restored and many rare documents, photographs and artifacts are on display for the first time.

For further information, visit the website www.churchillmuseum.org.uk.

Commemorations marking the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II are scheduled for London on July 10, midway between VE (Victory in Europe) Day and VJ (Victory against Japan) Day.

Events include a national remembrance service at Westminster Abbey, a flypast of vintage aircraft, and a parade through inner London, ending at Buckingham Palace. Some events are primarily for British veterans but others will be visible from London's streets. Website: www.mod.uk/aboutus/history

Jews of Gibraltar: The Rock of Gibraltar, the tiny rocky outcropping at the southernmost tip of Spain that is within viewing distance of Africa, is currently marking its 300th anniversary as a British territory.

Sometimes referred to as "the Pillars of Hercules," this unique and strongly democratic enclave is only about 10 square kilometres in size. Its diverse population of about 30,000 includes about 600 Jews who make up two per cent of the population. They are predominantly of Sephardi-Moroccan origin and some of their ancestors had already been on the Rock for centuries before British forces arrived in 1704.

Although the British initially attempted to ban Jews and Muslims from the strategically important territory after implementing the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713, that policy was abandoned. By the time of the Battle of Trafalgar in 1805, more than half of Gibraltar's civilian population was Jewish. While the number of Jews peaked at about 2,000 in 1939, many were evacuated to Britain during World War II and never returned.

While small, today's community boasts three schools and four synagogues, including Shaar Hashamayim, which is more than 250 years old and one of the oldest in Europe still used as a house of Jewish worship. During Shabbat services, congregants say a blessing for the British royal family and sing God Save the Queen in Hebrew.

By all accounts, the Jews of Gibraltar are said to enjoy shining relations with their fellow citizens.

"Gibraltar is a very united community," Rebecca Benggio, 36, a local school administrator, recently told the BBC. "It has a long tradition of respecting different religions and cultures. We get along together very well."

Exhibit on Jewish Architecture: "Jewish Identity in Contemporary Architecture," which opens at the Jewish Museum Berlin on March 3, examines how deeply architecture can influence and give shape to Jewish identity.

The exhibition presents models, sketches and photographs of numerous museums, synagogues, community centres and schools in the United States, Europe and Israel. It also includes an overview of some of Judaism's most significant historical buildings from the Jerusalem Temple to the Washington Holocaust Museum, and major projects by Frank Gehry, Moshe Safdie, Daniel Libeskind and other cutting-edge architects. www.jmberlin.de

Art of the Covenant installation opens

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For many years, artist Susan Rothschild Goldenberg has had a keen interest in the history of the Ark of the Covenant.

She has researched how art and architecture have been influenced by the Ark of the Covenant in Middle Eastern, western and African traditions.

Goldenberg, who was born and raised in Johannesburg, South Africa, studied art at the Bezalel School of Art in Jerusalem. She has travelled to Zimbabwe and visited a castle there that some believe was King Solomon's. In 1979, she and her family moved to Toronto.

"In Zimbabwe, I met with Jews who traced their heritage to the tribe of Dan," she says. "These people still sacrifice animals in prayer and celebration."

Goldenberg's fascination with the story of the Ark of the Covenant and its supposed voyage to Ethiopia led to her research on the Ark's effect on the people of Africa.

Susan Goldenberg displays one of the pieces in her Art of the Covenant installation at Gallery 61. The exhibit opens on Feb. 24 and runs until March 10.

On Feb. 24 at 7:30 p.m., Goldenberg's mixed media exhibition, "Art of the Covenant: An Installation," opens at Gallery 61, 61 Ossington Ave. It runs until March 10.

The exhibit recreates the Ark of the Covenant and includes Goldenberg's carved wood pieces, bronze angels, photographs and other artworks.

Through her art and carvings, she has attempted to unravel some of the mystery surrounding the Ark.

Throughout the 11th century, there was a struggle between new and old religions. "Jewish history was affected. It affected the balance of power in Ethiopia, as well as Gothic architecture and the ultimate resting place of the Ark of the Covenant," Goldenberg says.

For more information about the Art of the Covenant installation, call 416-633-9629.

Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band in top form

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

David Buchbinder's Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band was called back for an encore at its recent concert at the Isabel Bader Theatre.

And no wonder. These accomplished musicians know how to put on a good show.

Fresh from a Canada-wide tour, the band, marking its 17th anniversary as one of North America's finest klezmer ensembles, was in top form in a rousing two-hour concert that was at once mirthful and mournful.

Playing to a full house that showed its appreciation for their clap-along musical fusions and original compositions, the band members soared to magnificent heights.

Buchbinder, on trumpet and on centre stage, established the tone as the band completed 25 numbers, from Yiddish-inflected nigguns to Romanian-inspired horahs, in two seamless sets.

Robert Stevenson, performing on clarinet and uniquely formal in a suit and tie, was both cerebral and emotional.

Peter Lutek, on saxophone and clarinet and inexplicably shoeless, was fresh and powerful.

Stephen Donald, on trombone, exuded cool.

Rounding off the ensemble were Marilyn Lerner on piano, Victor Bateman on double bass and Dave Wall doubling as percussionist and vocalist.

Wall, a droll fellow, could be touching as he regaled the audience with several sighing, swooning songs.

In a moment of unanticipated levity that had the musicians beaming, Buchbinder's daughter caused something of a stir when she addressed him in a tiny toddler's voice from the gallery.

Unfazed and perhaps even delighted by the unrehearsed interruption, Buchbinder bounced back from his surprise like the pro he is and incorporated her sweet intrusion into the number.

That's the kind of concert it was – free-flowing and natural and really quite amazing.

On a frigid winter night in downtown Toronto, the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band provided warmth and proved yet again it is an asset to the Canadian entertainment scene.

Auschwitz television series is superb

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In a year when world leaders commemorated the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Auschwitz death camp, it came as a shock to hear that many Canadians, judging by the results of a recently released survey, are woefully ignorant about the Holocaust.

It seems clear that these individuals need more education. They can begin by watching Auschwitz: Inside the Nazi State, the superb six-hour PBS television series whose last episode was broadcast in early February.

Written and produced by Laurence Rees, a noted British filmmaker, Auschwitz retells the history of the camp through strong narrative, chilling archival film clips, revealing interviews with survivors and perpetrators, plausible dramatizations and trenchant comments by specialists such as Deborah Dwork, Michael Berenbaum, Claudia Koonz and Deborah Lipstadt.

The series consultant, Ian Kershaw, is the author of what is probably the definitive biography of Adolf Hitler, the mastermind of the Holocaust.

Auschwitz/Birkenau, the biggest killing centre in the evil Nazi empire, was the pièce de résistance of Hitler's diabolical scheme to wipe out the Jews of Europe in an unprecedented industrial killing process.

The first western European Jewish victims of Auschwitz were plucked from France, which agreed in 1942 to hand over Jews holding foreign citizenship. The organizer of these deportations, Adolf Eichmann, also played a pivotal role in the 1944 transport of Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz.

More than 200,000 Jews were dispatched to Auschwitz in 1942, when 1.2 million Jews from Nazi-occupied Europe were murdered in such other camps as Treblinka, Sobibor and Belzec.

New gas chambers and crematoria were installed in Auschwitz in 1943, which marked the year when the infamous doctor, Joseph Mengele, arrived there. Mengele, who could at once be brutal and charming, regarded Auschwitz as a human laboratory where he could cynically tinker with the lives of twins and dwarfs in gruesome medical experiments.

As these chapters of infamy were written with the blood of innocents, Heinrich Himmler, the SS chieftain, declared in Posen that the extermination of Jews represented a "page of glory" in the history of Nazi Germany. But to Dario Gabbai, a Greek Jew whose job it was to drag out the bloodied, black-and-blue corpses of Jews from the Zyklon-B-infested gas chambers, Nazi atrocities were beyond belief.

SS officials who supervized the camp were uniformly cruel. But in one case documented by Auschwitz, an SS man fell in love with a Jewish woman and saved her and her sister from the burning ovens.

In passing, the series recounts the rescue of Danish Jewry, which could not have occurred without the tacit co-operation of German officials in Copenhagen.

By the beginning of 1944, Auschwitz had claimed 550,000 Jews. But fresh disasters lay ahead as the Nazis occupied Hungary – ruled by a pro-German clique headed by Admiral Nicholas Horthy – and as camp commandant Rudolf Hoss was recalled to oversee the mass murder of Hungarian Jews.

As these events unfolded, Himmler, sensing defeat in the air, ordered Eichmann to "sell" one million Jews for 10,000 trucks the German army badly needed. To facilitate the deal, he met with Joel Brand, a Jewish leader, in Budapest. The Allies rejected the plan as a plot to split their ranks and bolster Germany's sagging fortunes.

During the same period, when the Allies dismissed frantic pleas to bomb Auschwitz and its rail line, American aircraft bombarded an I.G. Farben plant near the camp.

Three-quarters of the Jews shipped to Auschwitz in cattle cars under inhumane conditions were immediately singled out for death. At the height of the inferno in May 1944, Auschwitz consumed 10,000 Jews a day.

Hungarian transports to Auschwitz stopped on July 7 when Horthy, fearing postwar retribution, began distancing himself from Germany. Several months later, however, the fascist Arrow Cross militia staged a coup and the deportations were resumed with a fury.

With the Red Army advancing on Auschwitz, the SS tried but failed to destroy irrefutable evidence linking Germany to genocide.

Coward that he was, Hoss escaped from Auschwitz disguised as a sailor. But he was captured, put on trial and hanged. Hoss felt no remorse about the crimes he had committed. His only regret was that he had not devoted more time to his family.

Thousands of Nazis like Hoss went into hiding as the war wound down, and many were never prosecuted. In vigilante style, members of the Jewish Brigade, attached to the British army, killed a handful of Nazis after the war. But that was a drop in the ocean compared to the horrific crimes perpetrated in Auschwitz.

Auschwitz, a finely wrought documentary, chronicles these events with great precision. Schools, libraries and research centres should order a copy.

Auschwitz: Inside the Nazi State is available on DVD on the PBS website: www.pbs/org

Former NBA star linked to mosques that aided Hamas

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — A mosque established and funded by former NBA basketball star Hakeem Olajuwon gave more than $80,000 (US) to charities that the United States later determined are fronts for the terrorist groups Al Qaeda and Hamas, according to financial records.

Olajuwon said he was unaware of any links to terrorism when the donations were made, prior to the government's crackdown on the groups, and would not have given the money if he had known.

"There is no way you can go back in time," Olajuwon said from Jordan, where he is studying Arabic.

A U.S. Treasury Department spokesperson, Molly Millerwise, declined to discuss Olajuwon's contributions but said, "In many cases donors are being unwittingly misled by the charities."

Federal law enforcement officials said they were not investigating Olajuwon, a seven-foot centre born in Nigeria who played 17 seasons for the NBA's Houston Rockets and one injury-plagued season for the Toronto Raptors before retiring in 2002.

Olajuwon, who became a U.S. citizen in 1993, won the NBA's Most Valuable Player award in 1994, when he led the Rockets to the first of back-to-back championships.

The Olajuwon-founded Islamic Da'Wah Center gave more than $60,000 in 2000 and $20,000 in 2002 to the Islamic African Relief Agency, the centre's tax records show. The government shut down the relief agency in October 2004, saying it gave money and other support to Osama bin Laden and Al Qaeda. But the agency and its possible ties to terrorism had been in news stories years earlier, before Olajuwon's contributions.

The U.S. Agency for International Development cut off two government grants to the Islamic African Relief Agency in 1999, saying funding the group, "would not be in the national interest of the U.S."

Olajuwon also participated in a 1999 celebrity bowling tournament for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, which the U.S. government shut down in 2001, accusing it of sending money to Hamas. The Islamic Da'Wah Center gave more than $2,000 to the Texas-based Holy Land Foundation in 2000, according to its tax returns. At the time, Olajuwon was vice president of the mosque and provided more than three-quarters of its money.

Football pioneer Friedman named to Hall of Fame

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Benny Friedman was recently elected to the Pro Football Hall of Fame, perhaps with a little bit of help from his former players at Brandeis University.

When Friedman, a Jewish quarterback who was a pioneer in developing the forward pass, was elected to football's shrine recently, it came after several years of effort by those who knew Friedman as a coach at Brandeis from 1951 to 1959.

A group of alumni began the effort to gain recognition for Friedman as they developed a tribute to him at Brandeis' 50th anniversary dinner in 1998.

That effort was based not just on what Friedman achieved in building a short-lived football program at Brandeis – he was the school's first athletic director and its only football coach – but also on what he contributed to his players' lives.

Dick Bergel, who played halfback at Brandeis and graduated in 1957, said Friedman helped keep him in school by finding ways to support his widowed mother.

"I feel indebted to him for what I was able to achieve," said Bergel, a former vice-chairman of Montgomery Ward department stores who is now retired.

The Brandeis alumni looked into ways to get Friedman on the nominating slate for the Hall of Fame, but were told that move would have to come from the hall's seniors committee.

That finally happened last fall, when Friedman and Fritz Pollard were named as two of the 15 people eligible to be voted into the hall this year.

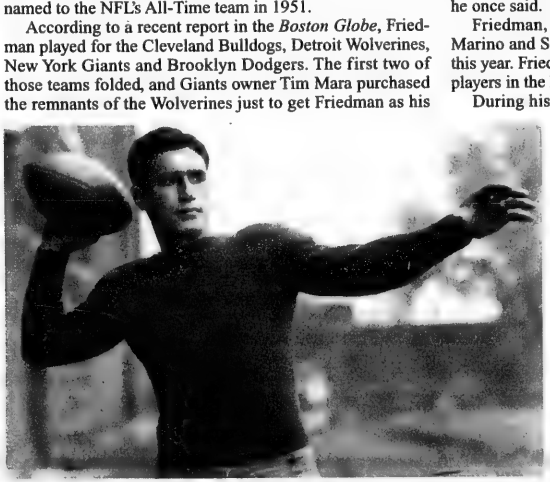
Headed by former team manager Bob Weintraub, the group of Brandeis grads sprang into action. The alums sent a package promoting Friedman's candidacy to the 39 members of the media who vote for induction into the Hall. Brandeis president Jehuda Reinharz wrote a separate letter to the Hall of Fame selectors, pushing for Friedman's selection.

They had a lot of accomplishments to promote. Though the Brandeis alumni knew Friedman as a coach, he made his mark as a player by perfecting the forward pass as a legitimate weapon.

Friedman first starred for the University of Michigan, where in 1926 he became the first Jew to captain the football team.

His NFL career lasted from 1927-1934. A sportswriter for the New York Daily News, Paul Gallico, once wrote that Friedman was the "greatest football player in the world." He was named to the NFL's All-Time team in 1951.

According to a recent report in the Boston Globe, Friedman played for the Cleveland Bulldogs, Detroit Wolverines, New York Giants and Brooklyn Dodgers. The first two of those teams folded, and Giants owner Tim Mara purchased the remnants of the Wolverines just to get Friedman as his quarterback and paid him the highest salary in the league, $10,000.



In 1929, Friedman's first year in New York, he threw 20 touchdown passes, twice the league average and a total that still would have led the NFL as late as 1977.

From 1927 to 1930, Friedman led the NFL in passing yards and touchdowns every season. During those years, he threw for 5,653 yards and 55 touchdowns. The next most productive passer in that era threw for 3,770 yards and 27 touchdowns, the Globe reported.

Benny Friedman [Photos courtesy Pro Football Hall of Fame]

In 1928, Friedman led the NFL in passing touchdowns and rushing touchdowns. He was selected as the league's best quarterback four straight seasons from 1927 to 1930. Even in his final full season, 1933, he completed 53 per cent of his throws, 10 per cent better than the next most accurate quarterback in the league, the Globe said.

His lack of recognition at the hall has been attributed, at times, to anti-Semitism, his perceived arrogance or his battles with the NFL over several issues, including pensions for former players.

The son of Russian Jewish immigrants, Friedman was born in Cleveland and once attributed his good fortune to Judaism.

He remembered that his mother told him she would put 18 cents – the number 18 symbolizes life in Hebrew – into a tzedakah box for him.

"I never questioned whether it was my ability that kept me aloof from injury. I let it go that chai was working for me," he once said.

Friedman, Pollard and more recent stars such as Dan Marino and Steve Young were voted into the Hall of Fame this year. Friedman becomes one of only a handful of Jewish players in the hall, joining such luminaries as Sid Luckman.

During his tenure at Brandeis, Friedman travelled with school president Nathan Sachar to promote and raise funds for the fledgling Jewish university.

"Benny was perhaps the greatest fundraiser for Brandeis during those years," Weintraub said.

Friedman left Brandeis a few years after the school disbanded its football program in 1960.

In later years, he suffered from declining health. Ill from diabetes and with an amputated leg, Friedman committed suicide in 1982.

But this August, his story will have a happier ending when he is inducted into the Hall of Fame.

The Brandeis alumni have no way of knowing whether their efforts had any effect, but when they learned that their former coach had been elected, they began planning a reunion for this summer to see Friedman honoured at the Canton, Ohio, shrine.

A land of milk and honey

"I can't believe you're not letting me go to Israel with my friends!" I screamed at my parents as I slammed my bedroom door closed and burst into tears. I was 15 years old and my kvutzah (group) from Hashomer Hatzair was travelling to Israel after our July session at Camp Shomria.

My parents forbade me to go because they felt Israel was too dangerous. I was devastated and confused by their reasoning. What was so dangerous about the land of milk and honey? I grew up in Toronto, where crime and accidents happen daily, so I didn't understand what the big deal was. At the time, I knew little about the political situation in Israel and I never thought it would prevent me from going. Some of my friends had been to Israel and they only had positive things to tell me about their trips. From their stories, I pictured sheep running carefree in groups through forests filled with olive trees. I visualized Israeli kids playing on kibbutzim and sharing their toys with each other while their parents worked either in the kitchen, the garden or with animals on the farm.

My five years in Hashomer Hatzair, a Zionist left-wing youth movement, taught me the value of socialism, and we mirrored the kibbutz lifestyle at camp. Our madrichim (counsellors) taught us to share our candy and treats with each other. All the chanichim (campers) had equal amounts of everything, "Just like the Israelis on kibbutz in Israel," we were told.

We all pitched in to clean the kitchen, bathrooms and cabins. Every Friday night for Shabbat, we dressed in white and I pictured Israelis wearing sparkling white crisp clothing as well.

When my parents forbade me from going to Israel, I remembered the first time I learned about problems in Israel. I was in Grade 2 at private school. At the end of each day, my teacher would erase the writing on the chalkboard except for a small section that we would be reviewing again the following day. Next to what she didn't want erased, she wrote "PLO" in large letters and then circled it. She told us the custodian knew that it stood for "Please leave on" and would not to erase it.

One day, she wrote "PLOB" on the board instead. She told us the school had banned her from using the old acronym because it stood for an organization that didn't like Israel called the Palestine Liberation Organization. As a seven-year-old, this didn't make much sense to me. But I never forgot there were people out there who didn't like Israel. I also remember the look on my teacher's face was one of both sadness and fear.

Now in my thirties, I have been to Israel twice, and I can't wait to go back. Although the political situation and war there is very real, and I don't for one second want to downplay the seriousness of it, most Israelis I have spoken to and seen there live their lives normally. When I was there, I took local buses with Israelis, I ate in restaurants, I walked the streets, and when I was on a kibbutz, I finally went to see the sheep.

As Jews in the Diaspora, we can't escape the unfortunate reality of the media portraying Israel only as a country at war, with debates over fences and politics. But let's try to remind others about the olive trees, the sheep and the kibbutz kids sharing their candy with each other. We cannot forget the spectacular beauty of the precious country that was given to us, the Jewish people.

Deuteronomy, Chapter 26, says: "Gaze down from Your holy abode, from the heavens, and bless Your people Israel, and the ground that You gave us, as You swore to our forefathers, a land flowing with milk and honey."

APPLE HARVEST RICE

1 cup thinly sliced carrots
2 tblsps. margarine
1 1/4 cup water
3/4 cup apple juice
2 tblsps. lemon juice
2 tblsps. brown sugar
1 tsp. salt
1 cup uncooked rice
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 cup raisins
1/2 cup sliced green onions
2 cups cored, sliced, unpeeled apples
1 tblsp. toasted sesame seeds

Cook carrots in margarine for 5 minutes. Add water, apple juice, lemon juice, brown sugar, salt, rice, cinnamon and raisins. Bring to a boil.

Reduce heat, cover and simmer until rice is tender and liquid is absorbed, about 15 minutes. Gently stir in green onions and apples, heat thoroughly.

Turn into a serving dish and top with sesame seeds.

Epi on Education

Lessons from La Boheme

Seymour Epstein

I noted that my last mention of opera in this column (CJN, Aug. 26, 2004) had resonance in the community. This calls for another lesson based on the world of opera.

Some years ago, I had the pleasure of accompanying a group of Jewish educators to Hungary in order to witness first-hand the rebirth of Jewish life in post-Communist eastern Europe. One of the educators was an Italian. One evening, the group decided to take in La Boheme at the sumptuous Budapest opera hall. At the end of the production, our Italian colleague told us a story about another production of La Boheme that he saw in Italy a few years before.

The production took place in an old concert hall with poor heating. The audience was suffering from the cold, and when, in the first act, Rodolfo tells poor, ailing Mimi that her hands are cold ("Che gelida manina!"), the audience screamed out: "Not as cold as our feet!"

What does all of this have to do with Jewish education? Those of us who attend the opera still think of it as an elitist form of entertainment. We are mostly untrained in music, and we usually don't know the language. We would never shout out at Hummingbird or Place des Arts. But Italians, who are completely at ease with the repertoire and know the language, feel comfortable enough to respond, even rudely. Jews who are new to their Judaism, or estranged for one reason or another, are uncomfortable, daunted by their ignorance of a beautiful legacy, and illiterate in the language of Jewish discourse.

Much of Jewish education should revolve around raising the comfort level, teaching literacy and encouraging constructive dissent.

We can't be Yisrael –one who struggles even with God– if we don't know the language.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

After the conviction: What now?

No longer do we have to concern ourselves with the impact that odious testimony and frightening images of the trial would create in the mind of our cherished and mighty Yechiel, 11, the youngest of Chavi and David's children. We exhaled with great relief, with the knowledge that Chavi and her other five children, David's mother, his brothers, family and those involved in the trial would not now lie in bed at night reviewing, ad nausea, the examinations, cross examinations and confusing legalese heard in a chilling and sterile courtroom.

Yet, with this knowledge that David's memory rests only in our hearts, not on a court stenographer's printouts or piled in boxes in a courtroom on University Avenue, what do we do now? With the blessing of a guilty plea comes an ill-defined tomorrow.

Now that there will be no trial, it's no longer a barrier to moving on. So what of my sister Chavi? If I had to guess, I think my brave sibling will work feverishly at nurturing and expressing her abounding love for her children and grandchildren with the zest and tenacity of two parents. No doubt she will continue to ease into the armour of the intrepid warrior she has become, showing all of us the inimitable spirit one can possess in the face of a paralyzing nightmare. I know her daily talks with her darling and adored David will not stop.

And what of Mayer, Sholom, Shera, Ezra, Shrage and Yechiel – the six children Chavi and David created? Inevitably, the unfairness of losing a father prematurely will crystallize, as will their appreciation of the strength – David's strength – that lies inside each one of them. Certainly, as stories roll in about David for years to come, the children will become more and more aware that their father, through his relentless acts of chesed (kindness), was larger than life and that the world really does listen and hear when a good man falls.

What of David's mother? I would like to extend to her blessings from the Toronto Jewish community, that her days on this earth should be forever sprinkled with peace through the awareness that she bore a magnificent child, who grew into a righteous man spreading 120 years worth of goodness in his short 49 years with us. Fay, what a vibrant spirit you must have, having raised three such special and extraordinary men.

What of David's brothers, nephews, nieces, friends and the community? We had among us a humble man whose gift of integrity and kindness was so powerful that it showed us what our world is able to accomplish. We will forever learn from David's legacy about our potential as Jews and human beings to calm the fear of a child, to alleviate the stress of a poor woman and to take away some of the pain of a sick parent.

Now that David Rosenzweig is only a memory, his seat at his Shabbat table, once occupied by a splendid human being, sits quiet and vacant, but the knowledge that a singular man can fly so high with decency and goodness will compel us to make our world shine like a gem.

Israeli cabinet approves disengagement

— Sets withdrawal date for July 20 —

Though most Israelis support Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan, the country remains sharply divided over the prospect. Above left, a soldier relaxes under a sign that proclaims "Sharon, the nation is with you. Continue!" Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A five-month countdown to the start of the historic withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and the northern West Bank began last Sunday when Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's cabinet passed the proposed law by a 17-5 majority.

In a separate move, the cabinet voted 20-1, with one abstention, to approve a revised route of the separation fence south of Jerusalem.

The date for the evacuation of the settlements was set for July 20.

The cabinet decision enabled Sharon to sign evacuation orders for all the Jewish residents of the Gaza Strip and the residents of four settlements in the northern West Bank.

The law passed in the Knesset last week by a vote of 59-40, leading to Sunday's cabinet vote. It includes a five-month delay between the decision to evacuate and the actual evacuation, to give settlers time to organize their move and receive compensation.

But the same law includes a strict punishment for those refusing to move at the end of the five months.

The seven-hour session opened with an emotional statement by Sharon, who said

Rosenzweig's killer sentenced to life

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The differences between the two men, as spelled out by Judge David Watt, could not have been more striking. On the one side, Christopher McBride, a self-confessed murderer, a 20-year-old man who had not seen his biological parents since he was four, a troubled individual who had been shunted between no less than 25 foster homes and who had proven time and again to be unmanageable, a man rarely employed and someone whose lengthy rap sheet included crimes of violence and disregard for the justice system and its rules.

On the other side, David Rosenzweig, a dedicated family man, a father of six, a devoted husband, an esteemed professional and a "pillar of his community," Judge Watt noted.

In the early morning hours of July 14, 2002, McBride, drunk and angry, lashed out and murdered someone who was completely innocent, "the last man standing" between McBride and an end to his vicious rage. For the crime of plunging a knife into Rosenzweig's back and killing him, a life sentence was mandatory. The only issue left for Watt to decide last week was the period of incarceration before McBride could apply for parole.

CANADA

Shuls in Kiruv Event

TORONTO — Seventeen Canadian shuls will join 600 others in the National Jewish Outreach Program's ninth annual Shabbat Across America/Canada event on March 5. The New York-based NJOP says the day aims "to introduce Jews with limited background in observance to the joy and beauty of the Jewish Sabbath." Shuls in Kingston, Windsor, Kitchener, Winnipeg, Edmonton and the Toronto area will take part. Visit www.njop.org for details.

Members Named

OTTAWA — Leo Adler, national affairs director for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, and David Bensoussan, president of the Communauté Sépharade Unifiée du Québec, were among 15 Canadians named to the federal government's new Cross-Cultural Roundtable on Security earlier this month. They will advise Deputy Prime Minister Anne McLellan, who is also minister of pubic safety and emergency preparedness, and Justice Minister Irwin Cotler "on how national security measures may impact Canada's diverse communities" while "promoting the protection of civil order, mutual respect and common understanding," the ministers said in a statement.

$1.2 Million Raised

TORONTO — Jewish federations and communities across Canada have raised $1.2 million for tsunami disaster relief, and $600,000 worth of medical supplies has been donated through a Toronto donor, UIA Federations Canada said last week. The money will be allocated by the American Joint Distribution Committee, which has raised $16 million to date.

WORLD

Neo-Nazis March

DRESDEN — Neo-Nazis marched in Dresden, Germany, on the 60th anniversary of the commemoration of the Allied bombing of the city. Some 5,000 people took part in one of the largest far-right marches in Germany since the end of World War II. Later, thousands of city residents gathered to honour victims of all wars. "We want to make clear that we in Dresden are for democracy and remembrance and don't want this event to be disturbed by others," said Saxony state premier Georg Milbradt.

Rescue Effort Recalled

CINCINNATI — A joint Filipino-American effort that saved 1,200 Jews on the eve of World War II was remembered in a Feb. 14 event in Cincinnati. The Frieder brothers, four deceased local businessmen who owned a cigar factory in the Philippines, and the country's president at the time, Manuel Quezon, brought German and Austrian Jews to safety in the Philippines with the help of U.S. and Jewish officials.

End Advisory: Petition

WASHINGTON — Jews and Christians have asked U.S. President George W. Bush to cancel a U.S. advisory against travel to Israel. A petition delivered to Bush last week was signed by Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, and evangelical Christian officials. It urges that a State Department warning in place since September 2000, urging Americans to "defer travel" to Israel, be rescinded in light of the improved security situation. Canada's Foreign Affairs department has a similar advisory, urging caution in travelling to Israel and to avoid Gaza and the West Bank.

Survivor Bar Mitzvah

WEST PALM BEACH — A child survivor of the Holocaust now living in Florida finally celebrated his bar mitzvah last Shabbat at a Chabad centre in Palm Beach county. Ben Fainer, 74, was nine when the Nazis invaded Poland in 1939. The only member of his family to survive, he was interred in concentration camps, including Buchenwald, in World War II and never had a bar mitzvah.

Israel to Mend Fences?

WELLINGTON — Israel has approached New Zealand to thaw the chill cast over relations by two suspected Israeli spies who were jailed last year in New Zealand for passport fraud, an official in Prime Minister Helen Clark's officer said last week. New Zealand imposed diplomatic sanctions and froze ministerial contacts with Israel over the case, demanding a public apology before it would restore full relations. Israel has refused comment on the two men, Israeli nationals Uriel Zoshe Kelman and Eli Cara.

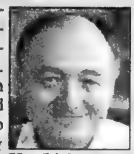
No Apology From London Mayor

LONDON — London Mayor Ken Livingstone is refusing to apologize for comparing a Jewish reporter to a Nazi concentration camp guard earlier this month.



Ken Livingstone

Prime Minister Tony Blair, London city council and Jewish groups all asked the mayor to apologize for comments to Oliver Finegold of the London Evening Standard. Livingstone refused, saying he has fought racism all his life and that he had been subjected to a 24-year hate campaign by the Standard and its sister paper the Daily Mail, which backed the Nazis in the 1930s.

The left-wing mayor, nicknamed "Red Ken," made the remark after a party marking 20 years since an ex-cabinet minister became Britain's first MP to come out as gay.

When Finegold asked him for a comment as he was leaving the Feb. 8 event, Livingstone asked Finegold if he was a German war criminal. When Finegold told Livingstone he was Jewish, the mayor said, "Well you might be, but actually you are just a like a concentration camp guard. You are just doing it because you are paid to, aren't you?"

Henry Grunwald, head of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, said the mayor's "insensitivity seems to know no bounds." He complained to the Standards Board for England, which will probe whether race relations laws were violated.

Community spending priorities: What to do when needs exceed resources?

Each year, the CJN's editorial advisory board brings together experts and other interested people to explore a specific subject of timely importance to the community. This year's discussion focused on the communal and spending priorities of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The public is generally unaware of the difficulties and the many important interests and values that must be balanced and weighed in the decision-making process on priorities and allocations. Needs exceed resources as ever-expanding social, welfare, security, educational and overseas needs compete for precious, but finite, resources.

Our discussion began with presentations by federation volunteer leaders and continued with a free-flowing, uninhibited discussion among the guests.

Although we envisioned an exploration of all the spending priorities faced by the federation, the discussion remained focused on the crisis in the cost of Jewish education, and we were unable to complete the discussion in the time allotted.

The Roundtable will reconvene to explore the many important priorities beyond pressing educational needs, and The CJN will report on those proceedings as well.

The editor.

Capital projects are a necessary part of community growth and do not reduce the funds available for other important projects, the incoming chair of UJA Federation said recently in opening remarks at a CJN roundtable on community funding priorities.

For many years, Toronto's Jewish community has invested in schools, community centres and other facilities that meet the needs of a growing population, said David Engel. The result has been creation of an infrastructure that includes the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (formerly known as the Bloor JCC), the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and buildings housing Associated, Leo Baeck, Netivot HaTorah and Eitz Chaim Hebrew day schools.

"The [Federation's Jewish Toronto] Tomorrow campaign continues a proud community tradition of proactively responding to new needs and anticipating emerging challenges. The Tomorrow campaign is leading the way by emulating the vision of those who preceded us," Engel told about 25 participants in a discussion at the offices of Goodman and Carr.

In pointing to the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow campaign, Engel was referring to an ambitious capital project that would see the federation allocate some $250 million over the next few years to expand and upgrade existing community facilities and construct a sprawling new campus in Richmond Hill. The Richmond Hill facility, to be located on Bathurst Street north of Rutherford Road, would house a new home for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

The scope of the fundraising campaign has raised eyebrows, with spiritual leaders and some day school parents questioning the allocation of such large sums to physical structures while annual day school tuitions remain as high as $15,000 per student.

In his prepared remarks, Engel appeared to address that critique indirectly, noting that "every time we, as a community, launched an ambitious new initiative, we always ensured available funding for core needs.

"In fact, the more avenues of fundraising we create, the more options for giving we provide, the more donors we encourage to become involved in Jewish life, the more money we can raise for all our needs. But only if we work together."

Quite the wrong lesson

From the editor's desk

In a world in which thousands continue to be murdered in Darfur, the scourge of HIV/AIDS relentlessly ravages the younger generations in parts of Africa, tsunami disasters extinguish nearly 290,000 lives in southeast Asia and the State of Israel stands, once again, at the precipice of a large, historic existential divide, it seems quite absurd to write about the foibles of the particular branch of the entertainment world that we know as the National Hockey League.

There are however, some lessons to be learned from NHL commissioner Gary Bettman's decision last week to cancel the 2004-05 season and the feeble failed efforts over the weekend to reverse it.

In these comments, we differentiate of course, between the NHL entertainment product and the game of hockey. They are not synonymous. And as so many writers have correctly pointed out, the game of hockey continues to be played by young and old alike in all the places whence it has always derived its defining vibrancy, namely, on frozen ponds, local skating rinks, schoolyards, college arenas, low-traffic side streets and even single-car driveways.

But it would be denying the obvious, especially for Canadians, to suggest that there is no significance at all to the cancellation of the NHL season. The NHL has been a folklore fount in the evolution of Canada's cultural ethos and sports heritage.

Rocket Richard of Montreal, Gordie Howe from Floral, Sask., Bobby Orr from Parry Sound, Ont., and Wayne Gretzky from Brampton, Ont. – and we could all name many more – are as much cultural icons as they are sports legends. The character traits they exhibited in their game – sacrifice, skill, dedication and resolve – are some of the very same traits Canadians project on a wider, enveloping basis upon the national character.

Over the many years, the league itself – not just the game – has stirred the hopes and held the loyalties of countless millions of Canadian fans. NHL team sweaters have been worn by generations of Canadian youngsters not as fashion statements, but rather as testaments of a deeper, dreamy attachment to imaginary-but-real heroes and role models.

Quebec writer Roch Carrier poignantly captured the nearly metaphysical loyalties and passions wrapped up in those hockey sweaters in his enchanting tale of the young boy who anticipated receiving a beloved three-coloured Canadiens' hockey sweater from his mother, but to his horror and great shock, received the blue and white sweater of the reviled Toronto Maple Leafs instead.

Both Gary Bettman and National Hockey League Players' Association head Bob Goodenow apologized for the cancellation of the season. But the apologies were hollow. In truth, they regretted only the refusal of the other side to bend, finally and totally, to their own respective will.

Owners are effectively demanding that the players protect the closed 30-owner circle from the cost-crazy impact of the owners' own, individual, reckless spending. They deny that it is they and not the players who truly set the ceilings for the players' salaries.

And across the table, the players balk at even a high, theoretical constraint to the amount of money they might make. That their salaries would be stratospheric under any system compared to the pedestrian incomes of the vast majority of their fans does not impress them.

In his vanity to mould the NHL after the fashion of the National Basketball Association or the National Football League, Bettman has likely caused the league irreversible harm.

The sports fans of Atlanta, Columbus and Nashville, for example, have a far profounder attachment to the games of basketball and football than they do to the game of hockey. And it is a good bet that the legends of international poker hold more folkloric magic for them than do the legends of the NHL. The cancellation of the NHL season there will be felt much less, if at all, than in any Canadian city.

The extent of the harm to the league will become clear in the unfolding months. The league may face new competitors; it may be forced to contract in size; many of its European stars may decide to remain in Europe for relatively comparable salaries. Without doubt, however, respect for the league has plummeted among its fans and the credibility of the owners as a group and of the players as a union has been shattered.

Its folkloric status in Canadian culture and the near-reverence among the idolizing youngsters who wear its sweaters obviously meant nothing to the league that decided last week to scupper the entire season.

We adult fans are generally mature enough to recognize the NHL labour fiasco for what it truly is: a contest between competing greeds.

But what does the league's decision teach our young, dreamy children about the value of loyalty and about the intrinsic worth of trying always to set the good of the many above the good of the few? It teaches them precisely the wrong lesson. –MBD

Toronto's 'best kept secret' has aided over 1,800

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Last fall, Joe Rosenblum, a 54-year-old credit manager, was laid off after 14 years at the same company.

Following an unsuccessful few months of job hunting, he contacted Kesher Employment Services, a free recruitment service that finds jobs for unemployed Jewish people.

"We went over my resume and they decided there were a few changes I should make," Rosenblum says.

"I followed their instructions, and a little while later I got a call from executive director Howard Kurlandski, [who told me] there was an opportunity."

Kesher staff arranged the initial interview, Rosenblum says, and after a second interview, he got the job.

"It's very good," he says of the new role, which started Jan. 31. "I'm enjoying it and it's a real challenge."

Celebrating its 10th anniversary this year, Kesher has successfully placed more than 1,800 people in permanent positions since its founding. In 2003, Kesher placed 233 people.

"In some respects, we're the best kept secret in Toronto," says Kurlandski. "Employers know us and they trust us... We have that kind of integrity in the market."

He says their integrity stems in part from the free nature of the service.

"They know we're not trying to sell something and that we're looking to make a match that will last," he says.

Kesher counts 2,000 companies on its list of registered firms and is used on average by 500 to 600 job seekers.

Kurlandski says the types of jobs Kesher has found range from entry level to senior positions at Fortune 500 companies.

Job seekers most commonly placed by Kesher have expertise in finance, accounting, information technology, engineering, production, managerial, marketing, sales, property management and clerical/administrative areas.

Kesher staff engages with companies and job seekers in several ways, including assisting with resume writing, salary negotiation and job searches, as well as skills matching and arranging interviews.

Their specialized recruitment software, Prohunt, is used to match the skills of unemployed clients with the job descriptions of employers.

In 2004, Kesher enjoyed a 29 per cent increase in the number of interviews it arranged compared to the previous year and a five per cent hike in placements.

Kurlandski attributes the success in part to running the non-profit service like a business.

"When companies need something, they need it now, and we make sure we don't miss an opportunity."

Rosenblum estimates it took only about a month for Kesher to place him and he praises the agency's personal approach.

"The other agencies on the Web didn't really do much for me, [whereas Kesher] paid more attention to me," Rosenblum says. "I wasn't just a number."

"The best thing people can do [when job seeking] is to be prepared," Kurlandski says.

"That means your resume is up to date and the best it can be, you have a clear idea of what you want, you know who you are and what your skills are, and if you don't have the skills you need to do what you want, you'll go get them."

Kurlandski also emphasizes the importance of confidence and optimism. "You have to be positive about yourself and your abilities. You have to establish what your value is and what you can offer."

A resume can showcase someone's talent by using powerful wording.

"Instead of saying you managed inventory, you can say you managed nation-wide inventory which resulted in increased efficiency by 'x' percent," he says.

"Critique your resume as if you were an employer looking at it."

To contact Kesher, call 416-635-9196.

Advocating for children with disabilities essential

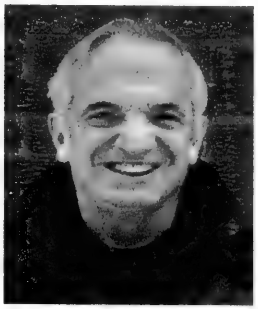
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Children with disabilities need to feel they are "part of the gang," says Mark Nagler, an author and motivational speaker.

"[They] want to be included. That is a basic necessity in building self-esteem and in thinking of themselves as legitimate human beings," he said.

Nagler was speaking at a Parent to Parent meeting about raising a child with special needs in the Jewish community.

The meeting was sponsored by UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, Tikun Chaim; Jewish Family & Child Service; Zareinu Education Centre; JVS Toronto; Bathurst Jewish Community Centre; Reena; Yachad/National Jewish Council For The Disabled; The Family Resource Centre; and Extend-a-Family.



Mark Nagler

Nagler was born with cerebral palsy. Although he has never been able to write and did not walk until he was five, he has authored 12 books. He earned a PhD, has taught at McMaster University and University of Waterloo, and is recognized by Canadian courts as an expert and consultant on disability.

"I know first-hand about living with a disability. Even though my parents were not educated, they were excellent advocates. They raised [me] without the basic understanding of what was needed to care for a child who was normally institutionalized."

It does not take education to advocate for a child, he said, it takes commitment. "That is crucial. But we must keep in mind that we all have a burnout point. We have to learn to take care of ourselves. If you let yourself go, your child doesn't have a chance."

The purpose of advocacy is to ensure that the children's rights are protected and that they are getting the best health care available. "We want to assist a child to live as independently as possible, in the least restrictive environment."

Some kids will never be independent, he said, "but we must make sure they get the best protection in the most positive way."

If parents do not have the time or skill to advocate for their child, "they should get their case managed. Children need access to all the best resources."

Nagler said other siblings should be involved in the loving and caring for the child. "Try to make your other children feel that they are important, not only for themselves, but for the help and support they can contribute. If other children are not made aware of their sibling's condition, they will feel isolated and separated."

At school, he said, there should be a cooperative environment between the parents, the teacher and the assistant. Together, they should determine what the child is capable of and how he should be treated in the educational system.

"Ask the teacher, 'What would you expect if my child were your child?' It is absolutely imperative to have a strategy in place."

One important strategy, he said, is to make sure the child has a circle of friends.

"My parents met with the teacher and three or four students, and asked them to form a friendship circle. It is an artificial setting, but it often works. When a person's disability is not accepted, they are open to bullying. Kids often act that way because they are unsophisticated, not because they are cruel."

Parents of children with disabilities must learn to be tough-minded optimists, he said. "[These people] believe they can take control over their futures, use their imagination to rehearse success, are cheerful even when they cannot be happy, and build lots of love into their lives."

McBride will be eligible for parole in 15 years

Watt accepted a joint recommendation from lawyers for the Crown and McBride and added five years to the statutory minimum of 10 years, leaving McBride eligible to apply for parole on July 16, 2017, 15 years after he was arrested for murdering Rosenzweig.

A visibly Orthodox Jew, Rosenzweig, 49, was killed outside a kosher restaurant on Bathurst Street, just south of Lawrence Avenue. The murder shocked the Jewish community and made headlines around the world. Many saw it as part of a disturbing pattern of increasing anti-Semitism worldwide and, at the time, Toronto police chief Julian Fantino said police would investigate whether hate played a role in the incident.

In setting the parole term, Watt noted that moments prior to stabbing Rosenzweig, who was standing with his son Ezra waiting for a tow truck, McBride had gone through a nearby kosher restaurant and yelled, "fucking Jews" or "motherfucking Jews."

Nevertheless, he did not specifically state that religious hate played a role in the crime or was an aggravating factor in the sentence.

He said the key elements in determining the sentence were the nature of the offence, the character of the offender and the need to send a clear message expressing society's revulsion at the crime.

"No sentence can restore David Rosenzweig to where he should be, a living, breathing, vibrant contributor to family, friends and his community," Watt stated.

In a statement read in court, his widow, Chavi, described the huge impact of his loss to his family. [See her statement on page 27.]

Earlier, defence lawyer Jeff Shulman had asked the court to take into account McBride's feelings of remorse as well as his troubled past. At age four, McBride was adopted, but at age 11 the family had the adoption annulled. From ages 11 to 15 he was shunted between 25 foster homes and at 13, he tried to kill himself. McBride suffered from attention deficit disorder, had problems with anger management and abused drugs and alcohol.

(On the night in question, McBride consumed the better part of two 40-oz. bottles of malt liquor, a high alcohol beer.)

Turning to the crime, Shulman called it "a brutal act of street violence."

Rosenzweig, he said, was the victim of "displaced anger," as McBride was really hoping to get even with some teenagers who had misled him about drugs. "Anti-Semitism," he said, "was not the match that ignited my client."

In his submissions, Crown attorney Fred Braley said the only mitigating circumstance in sentencing McBride was his decision to plead guilty and spare the Rosenzweig family the burden of reliving the incident.

After recounting part of McBride's lengthy criminal record, which included a 1998 conviction for assault with a weapon, he said McBride put himself into the position to commit murder by deciding to bring a knife to the pizza restaurant, where he thought he would confront the teens who toyed with him when he approached them looking for drugs.

Braley pointed out that McBride swung the knife at a restaurant employee who was not Jewish. "Frustration had built up when he came across the last person between him and his home.

"He was willing to vent his frustration at someone who was completely innocent."

But, Braley continued, religious hate was "not an issue that... we can or will be in a position of determining." Although McBride used "obscene terms," hate did not appear to be the motivating factor in the murder, Braley said. Rosenzweig was "the last person in McBride's way. The fact he was Jewish was a coincidence."

In subsequent phone conversations, McBride told friends that media reports were wrong to suggest hate was a factor. "He said that had nothing to do with it," Braley added.

Outside court, McBride's girlfriend, Mercedes Asante, 22, said religious hate did not enter into the incident. "There was nothing in there that was a hate crime," said Asante, who is black. "Obviously, he's with me, so it can't be a hate crime. If he didn't like the Jewish community, he wouldn't have lived in that area."

Asante, who attempted to restrain McBride that night, said, "I feel horrible about the situation."

Choking back tears, she told The CJN, "It shouldn't have happened. I don't know what to say to [Chavi Rosenzweig]. I'm sorry she had to go through something like this."

Commenting on the sentence, Canadian Jewish Congress noted the Crown's view that Rosenzweig's ethnicity did not play a part in the case. "For our community, it is emotionally difficult to accept that Rosenzweig's faith had nothing to do with his death, but the Crown obviously felt there was insufficient evidence to support hate motivation in the crime," said Joel Richler, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

B'nai Brith Canada interpreted the judge's remarks differently. It said the sentence is "sufficient acknowledgement of the hate element of this vicious crime."

A very difficult period

In what will surely come to be known as one of the most historic sessions in the young country's history, the cabinet of Israel voted on Sunday 17-5, to proceed with the dismantling of the Jewish communities in the Gaza Strip and four in northern Samaria. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said it was the most difficult decision he has ever made.

"This day isn't an easy day, and not a day of joy. The evacuation is a difficult step for the settlers, for the citizens of Israel and for me… This is also a difficult move for the government members. However, I believe this is an essential move for the future of our country," Sharon said at the beginning of the cabinet meeting. Later that evening, he elaborated somewhat by saying he believed the disengagement was vital "to ensure Israel's future as a Jewish and democratic state."

It was a sombre meeting of men and women who felt the full weight of the hard burden of their responsibilities, deliberating upon issues they knew were heart-rending and socially divisive, but necessary. Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom spoke for his colleagues when he said, "Even if there is a small chance for peace, we owe it to our children and grandchildren." But in a simultaneous effort to try to heal very painful societal wounds, he added, "We must embrace the settlers in this difficult moment. They are our pioneers."

The disengagement is slated to start in mid-February and will be phased in through a number of stages lasting some eight weeks.

Also on Sunday, the cabinet decided by a vote of 20-1 to revise the route of the West Bank security fence closer to the Green Line to conform better to the legal ruling of the High Court and to the security recommendations of the defence establishment. As a result, Ma'aleh Adumim and the Gush Etzion settlement blocs have been incorporated inside the fence.The new route places approximately seven per cent of the West Bank on the Israeli side of the fence. The U.S. administration has apparently expressed its approval of the fence's new route.

Immediately after the momentous decisions were announced, the Council of Jewish Communities proclaimed: "All those who raised their hand in favour of the transfer will be remembered as destroyers." The Yesha Rabbinical Council also published a statement that pronounced: "The deportation bill is against the Torah."

A large majority of the Israeli public supports the disengagement from Gaza and northern Samaria, but the prospect is wrenching nevertheless, even for a large number within that majority.

If we, the Diaspora supporters of the State of Israel, are to help the Jewish state and its people through the existential trials that surely lie ahead, we must do everything in our power, despite any private qualms or profound personal regrets surrounding the disengagement, to ensure the paramountcy of the rule of law in that tiny country.

Woe unto the state and to us if a minority of Israel's citizens, however aggrieved, attempt to strike down the rule of law, the widely protective pillar and pinion of normative, democratic life.

Without the rule of law, the entire modern Zionist dream is jeopardized.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO…

Pettigrew lays wreath on Arafat's grave

The Foreign Minister laid a wreath at the shrine of the terrorist former Palestinian president Yasser Arafat ("Pettigrew pledges unique Mideast role," CJN, Feb. 17), who murdered Israelis, pillaged millions of dollars meant to aid his own people and paid the families of suicide bombers.

My government had an opportunity to show respect for every victim of terror, respect for the stand against terror that the United States has taken. There are few times in life when the line between right and wrong is very clearly delineated and our government deliberately chose the wrong path.

The government should not hide behind the guise of acknowledging the plight of the Palestinian people. It did a disservice to those Palestinians who want peace but were forced to live under the tyrant Arafat. I wonder what my government has planned to acknowledge the survivors of Israeli families who have had their loved ones blown apart by Arafat's henchmen.

The Liberal Party has lost my vote and I will now campaign vigorously for the opposition.

Evangelical Christians

It is wonderful to have the support of any faith group for Israel in these difficult times ("Christian Zionists," CJN, Feb. 3). It is also a positive development that interfaith dialogue and co-operation are possible at this time in Jewish history. But it is a contradiction in terms to say that any evangelical Christians do not have the conversion of Jews (or any "unsaved" people) as their underlying agenda. Evangelism is their mandate and the soft-sell approach of financial and moral support can be enticing. They support Israel because they believe Jesus' return will be hastened by the establishment of a Jewish state in Israel. Then the Jews will convert or be destroyed. Perhaps we can be appreciative of their present support without public initiatives indicating a level of mutuality we cannot possibly embrace.

'Israeli Apartheid Week'

Sure, calling Israel an apartheid state is meant to be confrontational ("Plaudits to campus youth," CJN, Feb. 10), but I think we should look at how Israelis and Palestinians coexist: Palestinians are not welcome to live in Israeli settlements in the West Bank, Israeli settlers are not likely to live in the Palestinian territories (without military protection), and Arabs living within the state of Israel are not granted the same rights as Jews. Sure, it's not determined by differences of skin colour, but it also certainly is not an integrated way of living. Given Israel's comparative wealth and strength compared to the Palestinians, I think Israel has a greater ability to effect change. After all, the West Bank is in the "occupied" territories – that is, occupied after 1967 by Israel. It is not Israel that is under occupation. To admit that Israel is a segregated country is the first step towards solving the problem.

One last point on apartheid. South Africa was not the only apartheid state. In the United States, blacks and whites were (and to an extent still are) segregated. Cases like this are common around the world.

Foul language

I am writing you concerning the article on the late David Rosenzweig titled "Rosenzweig's killer to be sentenced this week" (CJN, Feb. 17).

The gratuitous use of the obscene "f" word, written in its complete spelling five times in the article, is unacceptable for a Jewish newspaper.

The prohibition against foul language is one that Judaism takes very seriously. The reason Hebrew is called the holy tongue is because there are no swear words in the original Hebrew language. The Talmud says that because of the sin of vulgar speech, troubles renew themselves and the youths of Israel die. The Talmud also says that "all know why a bride goes to the wedding canopy, but [for] anyone who speaks obscenely concerning it, [then] even a decree of 70 good years is changed to evil."

If you feel you must explain the harsh language of the murderer, it would suffice to write the letter "f." Everyone would get the point. The word is offensive to a large number of your readership and I would ask that in the future, you avoid spelling the word in full.

'Instruments of Faith' exhibit

We just read the review of Bob Burley's exhibit "Instruments of Faith" ("Photo exhibition focuses on Toronto's early shuls," CJN, Feb. 17). It was well written and informative; however, we noticed an ambiguity in the article concerning the Canadian Jewish Archives.

Credit for the mini archival exhibit should go to the archivist Carrie Limkilde, who pulled together most of this material.

Just who is putting all of Israel at risk?

By RABBI MARVIN B. PACHINO

"If men could learn from history, what lessons it might teach us! But passion and party blind our eyes, and the light which experience gives is a lantern on the stern which shines only on the waves behind us."

At first reading, one tends to agree with this observation by Samuel Taylor Coleridge – whom I remember best from freshman English for his The Rime of the Ancient Mariner.

However, upon reflecting on world events, one is moved to question whether that lantern of experience, which Coleridge claims "shines only on the waves behind us," shines at all. If it does, who is looking back to seek the illumination of hindsight?

This question is brought into frightening focus by a recently published book (available only in Hebrew at this time) titled Ruach Acheret, by Yonah Pressburger.

Ruach Acheret, which means "A Different Spirit," is a documentary album that uses prose and photographs very effectively to trace and record the public opposition to government policies in Israel "from the Oslo Accords to the Oslo War." It begins with Yitzhak Rabin's ascent to the prime minister's chair in 1992 and takes us through to June 6, 2004, when the Israeli cabinet voted in principle for unilateral disengagement from Gaza and four settlements in the northern Shomron.

Regardless of which side of the Oslo process or the disengagement plan one takes a stand on, this book compels an honest person to acknowledge the existence of strong parallels in the dogmatic and autocratic styles of Rabin and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, as well as former prime minister and current deputy prime minister Shimon Peres. The latter two appear to be completely indifferent to the lessons of the last dozen years.

Ruach Acheret documents Rabin's abandonment of the forms of democracy as he unilaterally smashed the platform upon which he was elected, and from which he won the mandate of government.

He then proceeded to demonize and delegitimize his opposition, using demeaning terms to characterize those who felt that he had sold them out.

Most troubling, as documented in Ruach Acheret, was the collusion of the media in their uncritical support of the Rabin government, their marginalization of the opposition and their frequent failure to even report as fact the occurrence of protest rallies attended by thousands. The erstwhile champions of freedom of assembly and the right of dissent actively collaborated with the government in portraying the opposition as comprised of people on the fringe, worthy only of being ignored.

The truth, again amply documented, is that the Israeli citizenry was fairly evenly split over the issue of Oslo. To suggest that half the population was composed of people on the fringe is simply ludicrous. But the big lie gained acceptance, nonetheless.

We can leave it to the sociologists to assess the damage done to the fabric of Israeli society by the insults and the ridicule that Rabin and Peres heaped upon their countrymen who deigned to take issue with their policies. However, that Rabin and Peres, with malice aforethought, set citizen against citizen cannot be denied, for that, too, is well documented.

"But passion and party blind our eyes," and today Sharon is engaging in some of the same tactics as he runs roughshod over his opposition, whom he demonizes and delegitimizes as he cynically manipulates the political process.

When Sharon decided it was necessary to step off his own election platform and onto that of former Labor Party leader Amram Mitzna, he should have learned from Rabin's errors. He should have been prepared to dedicate serious time for dialogue with those whom he could have predicted would become his opposition.

He should have scheduled blocks of time for give and take with the people who were to be dispossessed after having invested so much of their lives in building their communities, with the encouragement and blessing of the government itself over many years. In fact, Sharon had personally led the movement to populate Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

Both Sharon and his supporters might have evinced a bit of empathy and compassion, in particular for the Israeli residents of Gaza. Say what you will, but they are not parasites living high on the public treasury, nor are they messianists, by and large.

They are patriotic, loyal, hard-working, productive citizens who are facing expulsion from their homes, their businesses and their communal structures. Anxiety and stress at the prospect of traumatic separation from longtime neighbours and associates, not to mention family disruption, hang over them.

It is false and cruel to characterize them as impediments to the peace and well-being of the rest of the Israeli population, or as encumbrances to be cast off. It was criminal of Peres to refer to them as "shlemazels," which he did in recent weeks.

Not only is there resistance to learning from history, but there appears to be a willful refusal to take advantage of the light from "the stern which shines only on the waves behind us".

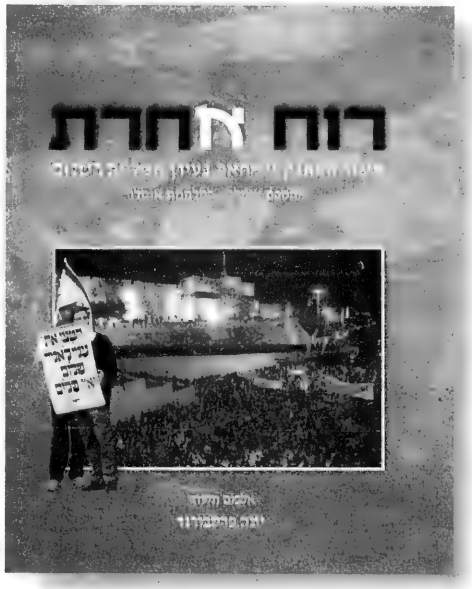
Once again, the media are complicit. They are shirking their role of asking the hard questions. They are not demanding to see thoughtfully developed plans with a detailed prospectus for implementation, as well as multi-disciplined analyses of the human implications.

Where are the 8,000 Jewish residents of the Gaza area to go, and what are they to do, upon their eviction? Where are they to re-establish their homes and businesses?

What are the guarantees for the continuity of their children's education?

Why are the liberal, humanitarian voices not being heard on their behalf?

Arrogantly ignoring the opposition is one thing. Demonizing it is quite another. Lying to it, and about it, takes us into another realm entirely. The record shows that Rabin and Peres made use of such tactics in the past.



Sharon and Peres are at it, again.

All the while, the media are playing the same hand, allowing the cynically constituted government off the hook completely as it paints the opposition as the villain.

The Canadian Jewish News, unfortunately, has not escaped being swept along by the tide of disinformation, and has actually become a party to it. It recently published an ugly and vicious column (CJN, Jan. 20) under the offensive and inciteful headline, "Messianic settlers put all Israel at risk."

It is a columnist's right to be in favour of the disengagement plan, as it is another's right to be opposed. It is not a columnist's right, however, to malign and demean other Jews and distort the views of those who have a different opinion of things.

The columnist, true to form, did not defend the disengagement plan on its merits. She merely vilified the opposition, gave them a pejorative label and ascribed malice to them while striking the pose of the righteous protector of the higher good.

Regrettably, the tack she took runs in a straight line from Rabin and Peres in the 1990s.

Ruach Acheret documents the multifaceted composition of the opposition to Oslo during that time.

Today's opposition to Sharon's unilateral disengagement plan is, similarly, not monolithic. Thousands upon thousands of Israelis from all walks of life, and from all sections of the country, have raised many unanswered questions. Those posing the questions include prominent military strategists and intellectuals, secular Jews and religious Jews.

Many in the Israeli security establishment have also voiced their doubts and concerns. Hardly a bunch of messianists or shlemazels!

While stopped at a major Jerusalem intersection during the first week of February, I saw another indication of the population mix that opposes the disengagement plan. A young woman and a young man, in their early 20s and very obviously not religious, were distributing bumper stickers that read: "Yehudi lo megaresh Yehudi" – "A Jew doesn't expel another Jew."

One certainly, cannot help but be distressed upon hearing or reading what is happening in Israeli society today. It is frightening. It is demoralizing. And there is more than enough blame to be shared by all parties to the current struggle. But the moral equivalence stops there.

The greater burden of responsibility falls upon a prime minister and his government. They are charged with exercising wise and strong political leadership that is, at the same time, sensitive and compassionate toward its own citizens. They are duty-bound to guarantee that each citizen is treated with respect. Above all, they dare not play one segment of the population off against the other in the name of some illusory notion of peace with those who have yet to reject terrorism and begin speaking of peace.

And that is the crucial point. For, if it were real peace that was being negotiated with interlocutors who acknowledge that terrorism is morally wrong, not just inexpedient, then Jews could live unafraid in Gaza under Arab rule, just as Arabs live in Israel today. There would be no need to uproot Jews from their homes.

If Israel is at risk, it is because the greater Arab world remains unprepared to live side by side with Jews, whether in Gaza, Jerusalem, Tel Aviv or Haifa – or, for that matter, anywhere in the Middle East at all.

But there is an even greater risk that Israel faces, and it does not come from Israelis who exercise their democratic right to question and protest government decisions. The more serious threat comes from those who will not learn from history and would divide this nation into "them" and "us" by a tyranny of the elites – or those who fancy themselves to be the elites.

Rabbi Marvin B. Pachino is the former headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

An obsolete mantra

I am a regular recipient of unsolicited e-mails about Israel. The senders are usually Jews in the Diaspora whom I know to be open-minded liberals when it comes to politics in their own countries. But the material they forward is mostly of the right-wing variety.

Rabbi Daw Marmur in Toronto

It seems that when it comes to Israel, many Diaspora Jews who support the prudent centre at home suspend their politics in the misguided belief that by being right-leaning radicals, they show solidarity with the Jewish state.

This kind of doublethink is a common diaspora malaise. Palestinians living abroad are very prone to it. That is one reason why Palestinian students, aided by other Muslims, harass Jews on university campuses. Though these Palestinians are also beneficiaries of a liberal education, when it comes to their real or imagined homeland, they act as if they have learned nothing in the lecture halls and seminar rooms. They assuage their sense of guilt at not being there by attacking Jews here.

If the inhabitants of the two diasporas could overcome their psychological hang-ups, they might be able to play an important part in working for peace and mutual understanding. By trying to put into practice what they've learned in school, they could serve as role models for people at home.

My Jewish correspondents often give two reasons why their liberalism does not apply to their views about Israel.

First, they say that a liberal approach is based on mutuality, and they insist that liberals have no partners on the Palestinian side. They ignore the Palestinian signatories to the Geneva Accord and other plans that advocate peace, moderation and mutual accommodation. They pay no attention to the very different climate created by Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's successors. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has acknowledged it. Why do Jews in Canada and elsewhere hesitate?

And what about polls showing that a growing number of Palestinians are imbued with liberal values and ready to compromise for the sake of peace? Even Palestinian TV sometimes airs their views these days.

The second reason offered for adopting a hard line when it comes to Israel is that it's the task of the Jewish Diaspora to support the Israeli government in power. So why the many articles I get that are highly critical of Sharon's intention to disengage from Gaza?

Reiterating the dual mantra that Jewish liberals have no counterparts among Palestinians and that Jews must always support the Israeli government seems to be an excuse, not a reason. It is obsolete. It inhibits Diaspora Jews from being of real service to Israel. The fact that Palestinians and their supporters act in similar fashion is more of an indictment than an explanation.

Reading the signs at UBC

Last Friday, I journeyed from Simon Fraser University to the University of British Columbia to attend Vancouver Hillel's pre-Shabbat event "Jews N Brews," where Jewish students from the various colleges and universities in Vancouver gather weekly for a beer to celebrate the end of the academic and Jewish week.

Jessica Apter in Vancouver

Whenever I make this trip across the city to see my friends, I find myself astonished at the beauty of the city of Vancouver, sitting serenely in the shadow of the snow-capped mountains of the North Shore. Indeed, being surrounded by the mountains of British Columbia and Washington State is one of the greatest things about living on the West Coast. Along with the rain, it's one of the things I miss most about Vancouver when I'm home in Toronto for the summer.

The geography is more than just a nice view. It takes my breath away and reminds me every day of just how lucky I am to have the unique experience of living here, studying what I love, and exploring my identity – partly through developing my sense of independence and partly through my involvement in local and national Jewish campus life.

And the natural and Jewish campus worlds don't exist in isolation from one another.

Vancouver Hillel prides itself on adapting to its surroundings, and it prides itself on its involvement in local activities. Evidence of that connection are its ski and snowboard trip to Whistler in December, the distinctly outdoorsy feeling of its annual welcome back barbecue and the transformation of Sukkot into a camping-like activity in the centre of campus.

This year, Hillel sponsored a Tu b'Shvat hike, which was organized by Julia Segal, a student and friend who attended a conference led by the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life. The program consisted of a "walking seder" through Pacific Spirit Park, the beautiful forest on UBC's endowment lands. We stopped at four landmarks on the trail to recite and discuss prayers over the traditional holiday fruits and nuts, as well as read poems and stories about nature, Tu b'Shvat and environmental sustainability.

Until last March, UBC Hillel's large wooden welcome sign was well-displayed in front of the building. The words "Hillel House" were framed by textured mountains with ocean waves lapping the bottom. Many remarked that the sign made Hillel House seem more like a wilderness ski lodge than a centre for Jewish campus life.

What's interesting is that the sign contained no "Jewish" symbols. It simply celebrated the beauty of the campus and city whose Jewish community the house serves. It also celebrated the uniqueness of Vancouver Hillel compared to other Hillel branches across the country, as it was unlike the sign at the entrance to the shiny new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto Hillel, and probably unlike the sign at every other Hillel in Canada. Even if a Jewish student was oblivious to the natural beauty surrounding them, he or she couldn't have missed that sign in front of UBC's Hillel House.

When the six-foot-long, 100-pound sign went missing last year during a night of St. Patrick's Day celebrations at UBC, students and staff at Hillel debated whether the incident was a random act of vandalism or one that was deliberately anti-Semitic, especially considering after a tumultuous year in relations between Jewish and non-Jewish students across the city.

Last Friday, while I sat with my fellow Jewish students in one of UBC's campus bars for our weekly event, the sign was returned to Hillel House by two well-intentioned students who found it on the other side of campus and knew exactly where to bring it.

Hillel's director of programming, Noah Slepkov, was so elated at this that he actually proclaimed the discoverers to be "philosemites" and "righteous gentiles."

The return of that unique Hillel House sign gave us one more thing to celebrate as Shabbat – and, for some of us, reading week – began.

Binding Joanna Grossman

My first year as an undergraduate was different from most, as instead of taking regular introductory classes, I took the University of King's College's foundation year program (FYP). The FYP is unique because it combines four of five first-year classes into one massive class that attempts to trace the progression of western thought from the earliest writings of Gilgamesh and Plato to our own postmodern age.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

The FYP is an experience unlike any other, because it leads the impressionable first-year mind through a history of ideas in which every stage – be it ancient, medieval or modern – presents a new picture of the world. As an FYP student, you feel as if you yourself are climbing out of Plato's cave, making the journey up to Dante's paradise and fighting through Hobbes' state of nature. The ideas of each thinker seem radical compared to what came before.

While I have many memories of my year in FYP, the most pervasive and lasting is about confronting ideas that seemed so foreign to me. In my elementary education at Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School, I was exposed to the ins and outs of Jewish culture, history and tradition, but I remained ignorant about the corresponding culture and history of the Christian tradition, upon which the FYP is necessarily grounded.

And so I sat in my first-year tutorials, asking question after question, trying to grasp the concepts of the Holy Trinity, transubstantiation and original sin as we considered the works of Aquinas and Dante. I remember feeling like the odd kid out, as I could not seem to wrap my head around concepts that no one else seemed to raise an eyebrow about.

Now, four years later, the tables have been turned, but in a very peculiar way. My fourth-year core class in the King's contemporary studies program considers postmodernism, but more precisely, it looks at 20th-century philosophical and cultural thought, which has necessarily been affected by perhaps the most incomprehensible event of our age, the Holocaust.

In class each day, I try to make sense of the many thinkers who have attempted to confront the Holocaust and the consequences that result from it in terms of thought – philosophical, cultural and political. Interestingly, my Jewish education – which has provided me with a detailed knowledge and understanding of the Shoah, and even more profoundly, a personal connection to it through programs such as March of the Living – often makes it harder to confront philosophy that seeks to move beyond Auschwitz, or at least, tries to salvage philosophy from it.

When something is foreign and unfamiliar, it's easy to approach it with a critical lens. But when you feel something on a personal level, achieving the distance that's often needed for a critical encounter is far more difficult, and perhaps impossible.

But now, as we rely on the thought of such Jewish thinkers as Levinas, Derrida and Benjamin, my Jewish knowledge proves invaluable as I take as given concepts such as messianism, talmudic logic and the figure of a wholly transcendental God that cause other students to lapse into complete and utter frustration.

At the same time, though, this knowledge makes my task as a student of philosophy far more challenging, as I often find myself incapable of questioning ideas and notions that I accept as given and not subject to intellectual understanding.

I am currently immersed in writing my honours thesis. In keeping with my tendency to pursue things that are at once the most interesting and the most difficult, I have opted to explore philosophical interpretations of a quintessentially religious moment: the binding of Isaac.

As I sit down to work, I find myself between two poles, the religious and the philosophical, hoping to find a way to make the two come together. I can't accept that my relation to faith and tradition should be without critical inquiry and investigation. Yet, for me, philosophy can't enter into religion.

Confronting the things that are closest to you always proves the most challenging, because a lot is at stake. At the same time, of course, that's why such investigations always prove to be the most fulfilling.

The Kirshner File

Sharon, Abbas give peace a second chance

In the keynote speech at the Herzliya conference on national security last December, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon predicted that 2005 would present Israel with "a chance for a historic breakthrough in our relations with the Palestinians." As if to underline Sharon's upbeat point, Shaul Mofaz, Israel's defence minister, subsequently observed that 2005 could be "a year of opportunity" for peace.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

It now looks as they were not merely engaging in rhetoric. With Israel and the Palestinian Authority having resumed high-level contact after a prolonged period of mutual animosity, hope is in the air for the first time since the outbreak of the Palestinian uprising 4½ years ago that diplomacy can trump warfare. In a sign of the times, Sharon said last week that Israel would be willing to coordinate with the Palestinians its planned withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. Although Israel and the Palestinian Authority have yet to address final status issues ranging from borders to Jewish settlements in the territories, and remain deeply at odds over Israel's controversial separation fence snaking along and into the West Bank, there is reason to believe that the situation has changed, and that the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan can be revived.

Observers are guardedly optimistic because Yasser Arafat, the Palestinians' iconic leader, has passed from the scene and has been replaced by a more forthcoming successor, Mahmoud Abbas, who was elected president of the PA on Jan. 9. Always suspicious of Arafat as an untrustworthy interlocutor complicit in terrorism, Sharon considered him an obstacle who had to be removed. Short of disposing of him, Sharon kept Arafat penned up at his headquarters in Ramallah. The United States, Israel's ally, scorned and boycotted Arafat as well.

With Arafat's death on Nov. 11, Israel took steps to bolster Abbas' standing, easing checkpoints and roadblocks and reducing military operations in the West Bank and Gaza. But when violence flared up again in Gaza, following Arafat's funeral and Abbas' accession to power, Israel hit back hard. Sharon was angered by the bombing of an Israeli outpost that killed five soldiers, by the raid at the Karni cargo terminal that claimed the lives of six Israelis and by the resumption of rocket and mortar attacks against settlements in Gaza that killed two civilians.

In response, Israel launched a series of major incursions into Gaza, threatened a fullscale invasion and told the army it had free rein to protect Israelis. Israel also sealed off its borders, closed Gaza border crossings and warned Abbas to redouble his efforts against terrorism.

Meanwhile, Abbas, who has long argued that the "militarization" of the intifadah was a grave mistake that cost the Palestinians dearly, vowed to restore order, urged armed militias to honour an informal ceasefire, opened talks with Hamas and Islamic Jihad on observing a truce, decreed a ban on the carrying of weapons in Palestinian-controlled areas and ordered a halt to the firing of Qassam missiles at Israeli settlements. And in a reflection of the new and improved atmosphere, Palestinian television, perennially criticized by Israel for its inflammatory programming, toned down its martial tone.

Satisfied with these measures, Israel gradually resumed security and diplomatic co-operation with the Palestinian Authority, curbed military activities in the territories, pledged to stop targeted assassinations of Palestinian militants (except in the case of "ticking bombs" plotting attacks) and promised to release 900 prisoners "without blood on their hands." Under U.S. pressure, Israel revoked a cabinet decision, taken unilaterally by two ministers, permitting the seizure of Palestinian property in eastern Jerusalem. In addition, Israel announced its intention to withdraw from five Palestinian towns in the West Bank – recaptured in the spring of 2002 in Operation Defensive Shield – starting with Jericho.

But in its most important and potentially far-reaching decision in the post-Arafat era, Israel finally ended its boycott of the Palestinian leadership, as underscored by Sharon's meeting with Abbas at the Sharm el-Sheikh summit on Feb. 8 under Egypt's auspices. The summit, to which King Abdullah II of Jordan was invited, failed to produce a formal ceasefire. But Sharon and Abbas separately declared a truce that may yet end the intifadah.

Since its outbreak, a succession of ceasefires have come and gone, including the short-lived hudna in 2003. For at least two reasons, this one may endure. Abbas, one of the architects of the Oslo peace process and Arafat's first prime minister, is a pragmatist with whom Israel can do business. Sharon, at last, appears ready to grant the Palestinians considerable territorial concessions if circumstances warrant flexibility and generosity.

Abbas is a fervent Palestinian nationalist – and a refugee from Safed – whose agenda is in sync with the Palestinians masses. Prior to his victory in the recent election, the second since 1996, he was photographed with Zakaria al-Zubeidei, a commander of the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade whom Israel has tried to hunt down. Then, after seven Palestinian youths were killed by an Israeli tank shell, Abbas described Israel as "the Zionist enemy."

His harsh language notwithstanding, Abbas is prepared for coexistence with Israel, unlike some Palestinian radicals who take an all-or-nothing approach. In 1999, when Ehud Barak was Israel's prime minister, Abbas presented the United States with a proposal for a peace accord, turning on the establishment of a Palestinian state with east Jerusalem as its capital, Israel's withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines and a just resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem.

To this day, Abbas remains committed to these guidelines, which underpinned Israel's talks with the Palestinians at Camp David in July 2000 and at Taba later on. These demands, which enjoy virtually universal approval abroad, would be a bitter pill for Sharon to swallow, and he may yet reject them.

Sharon is disappointed by Abbas's refusal to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism in the West Bank and Gaza. But Abbas fears that an unrelenting crackdown would spark a civil war, a spectre Arafat dreaded, too. Like Arafat, in whose footsteps he has promised to follow, Abbas prefers to co-opt the militants, who may yet undermine him.

Abbas, however, was not loath to fire top commanders in Gaza after they allowed Hamas operatives to bombard settlements in Gaza, just two days after the summit in Egypt. Since Palestinian shells were still falling on Jewish outposts in Gaza as of last week, Abbas may eventually have no alternative but to forcibly disarm the militants.

Certainly, Abbas must be heartened by the news that Hamas – which is on record as advocating Israel's destruction – may be willing to tolerate its existence.

On Jan. 21, Hamas distributed a document in which, for the first time, it officially recognized Israel's 1967 borders. The offer is conditioned on Israel's acceptance of a viable, contiguous Palestinian state whose capital would be eastern Jerusalem. Hamas may be playing fast and loose with words, but a long-term ceasefire with Hamas would doubtless be in Israel's strategic interest. The news that Hamas may have softened its position toward Israel should be seen in the context of Sharon's gradual but as yet incomplete political transformation.

Sharon, who once superficially equated Tel Aviv with Netzarim, an isolated settlement in Gaza, seems to have reassessed his fundamental and heretofore unbending view of what he is ready to give the Palestinians in exchange for peace. At the Sharm el Sheikh summit, he relayed two key messages that may ultimately define his premiership and niche in history.

To the Palestinians, he said, "I assure you that we have a genuine intention to respect your right to live independently and in dignity." Sharon, presumably, was referring to a two-state solution, upon which the "road map" peace plan is based. A phased withdrawal from Gaza and four settlements in the northern West Bank, scheduled to begin this summer, would jump start this belated process. But what will Sharon do with the rest of the West Bank? That is the big question.

To his fellow Israelis, he said, "We in Israel have had to painfully wake up from our dreams, and we are determined to overcome all the obstacles in our path in order to realize the new chance that has been created." Sharon, given the emergence of Abbas, the imperatives of demography and the internal and external pressures building to defuse the simmering Palestinian issue, may have come to the conclusion that Israel has reached a crossroads from which it cannot turn back.

In practice, this means that Israel can no longer afford to appease a small but influential minority of messianic Jewish zealots in the West Bank and Gaza and their allies who may fight to the last drop to preserve their vision of a greater Israel. They, in tandem with Arab extremists from Hamas and Hezbollah, are capable of blocking a peace agreement that most Israelis and Palestinians desire after so many decades of strife and bloodshed.

Learning your options in Jewish education

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Jewish parents of preschoolers with questions about the educational future of their children will have the opportunity to get answers at the upcoming Options in Jewish Education.

Close to 200 parents are expected to participate in the program - co-sponsored by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and its Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto (JIST) – at the Lipa Green Building (4600 Bathurst Street), on Thursday, March 10 from 7:30 to 9:00 p.m.

Tackling a number of subjects on the minds of new Jewish parents, Options in Jewish Education will explore issues such as choosing a Jewish day school or an appropriate after-school program; the range of choices available in the GTA; special programs and special needs and costs and benefits.

For the first time ever, parents at this year's event will be meeting approximately 20 representatives from affiliated BJE schools who will be on hand to participate in a question and answer period following the event.

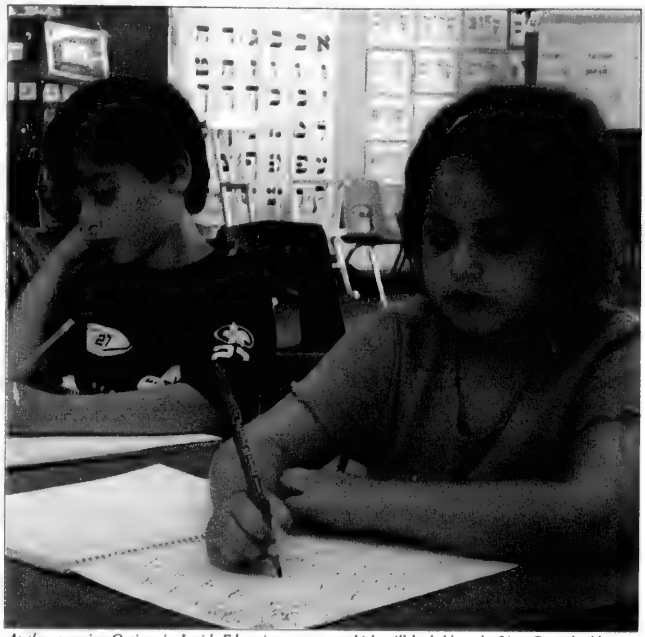
"This is an excellent opportunity for parents of young children to explore the virtual rainbow of possibilities available to them in Toronto's arena of Jewish education," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's Senior Vice-President for Jewish Education & Identity. "Together, we will survey all of the wonderful schools available so that these parents can ensure a literate Jewish future for their children."

Thornhill resident Heather Aaron and her husband Michael – parents of three year-old twins – will be at the event armed with a list of questions.

"We want to know exactly what's out there and what choices we have," said Heather. "We hear a lot of stories from people about this school or that school, but a lot of what we hear is just anecdotal and rumours. One thing we really want to learn about are subsidies. We have two kids to send at the same time, so it's going to be double the cost. I want to know how subsidies work and who, exactly, qualifies. "

"We haven't had to deal with this issue yet, so this event will be our first real look into our children's education," says Ilana Rabie who, along with husband Anton, have two young children – Carly, 20 months and Lexi who is just three weeks old.

"We want our children to have the best possible Jewish education but we still don't know if we want to do that through day school or by supplementary school," says Rabie. "There are a number of issues that we need to discuss, and we're just hoping that this program sheds some light on things for us."



At the upcoming Options in Jewish Education program, which will be held at the Lipa Green building on March 10, parents of preschoolers will discover the full range of educational choices available to their children.

Thinking inside the box

UJA Federation's Toronto Jewish Arts Council is holding an inaugural exhibition gala for its Tzedakah Box Project on April 5, 2005, from 7:30 p.m. to 9:30 p.m. at the Koffler Loggia Gallery, located in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 4588 Bathurst Street.

The event will showcase more than 70 tzedakah boxes, created by local artists, such as Janis Karlinsky's work pictured here, who have donated their unique creations which are available for purchase by ticket holders at the $180 Tzedakah Partner level. Choice of tzedakah box will be determined by order of registration. Guests wishing to attend the function can purchase tickets for $36.

All proceeds from the Tzedakah Box Project will go to support new initiatives of the Toronto Jewish Arts Council to foster and encourage artistic expression in Toronto's Jewish community.

The tzedakah boxes will be on display at the Koffler Loggia, between March 30 and April 5, 2005.

For tickets or more information, contact Shelly Rotman at 416-635-2883 x.137 or srotman@ujafed.org

Newly acquired negatives picture our past

Ontario Jewish Archives asks for readers' help

UJA Federation's Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) has recently acquired more than 1400 photographic negatives from Al Gilbert, the celebrated Toronto photographer. Gilbert Studios celebrated its 80th anniversary in 2003.

The negatives document Toronto's Jewish community from the 1920s until the late 1970s. They depict politicians, community leaders, Jewish celebrities, athletes and individuals from the Jewish community.

The OJA, which is currently processing this collection, has plans for an online exhibit in the upcoming year but can't do it without help from readers in identifying the individuals and providing background information for the photographs depicted here.

Gilbert, who was awarded the Order of Canada in 1990, has photographed countless celebrities such as Dizzy Gillespie, Oscar Peterson, Prince Charles, Toronto's former mayor Phil Givens, Al Waxman and the comedic duo Wayne & Shuster. His work has also featured a subject close to his heart - the Toronto Jewish community. The Gilberts have spent a lifetime photographing Jewish weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, community dinners, and prominent Jewish individuals.

The family business was started by Al Gilbert's father, Nathan Gittelmacher, who opened Elite Studios, in 1922 on Queen Street West. Elite Studios specialized in portraits and catered to a mostly Jewish clientele. Albert Gilbert began working with his father in 1944, and in the 1940s the business name was changed to Gilbert Studios.

A fresh look at countering anti-Israel sentiment on campus

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

The increase in anti-Israel sentiment on Toronto university campuses has prompted a new approach by Jewish students to deal with this urgent problem.

Adam Hummel, a second-year student at York University and co-chair of the Hillel Israel Affairs committee at York, has witnessed some contentious situations with opposing groups. "In these situations, I've learned that confrontation is pointless," he explains. "Instead, we counter such demonstrations in a non-confrontational fashion; we achieve this by providing a variety of programs that are topical and positive."

Such programs include visits from Israeli filmmakers, musicians and authors, film screenings, as well as arts and culture exhibits, to name a few.

Upcoming programs, offered through Hillel of Greater Toronto, which cover the spectrum of religious, social, and cultural themes, include:

- MARCH 3: Dr. Judea Pearl, the father of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl z"l who was murdered 3 years ago in Pakistan for being Jewish. Dr. Pearl is the editor of a new book entitled 'I am Jewish: Personal Reflections Inspired by the Last Words of Daniel Pearl'. He is speaking at York University during the day and, later, at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, as part of a speaker series Hillel offers with Beth Tikvah's Jewish Education Centre.
- MARCH 10: Judith Katzir, an Israeli writer who will discuss women in Israeli literature.
- MARCH 17: Fashion for Passion. A unique fashion show featuring Israeli designers.
- An arts and culture festival at the end of March.
- Hillel's annual leadership training weekend in May with trips to Boston & New York.
- A six week Israel education course that begins in May.

The variety of these programs attracts otherwise-disconnected students but also promotes positive messaging, steering clear of political debate, explains Hummel.

Laura Herman, 19, a first year student at the University of Toronto (U of T), who grew up with a strong sense of identity in the small Jewish community of Mississauga, chose to be active on campus specifically to enhance the pluralistic nature of programming, through her involvement with Hillel, which is the voice of Jewish students on campus, supported by UJA Federation. "It's important for all to understand that there are different viewpoints but that we can work together to reach a common goal - even if we come from different backgrounds," she says.

For Rob Meth, 21, a third year Radio and Television Arts major at Ryerson University, being able to speak with authority means one must have proper training. "This comes from education," he says, which he received through his participation on the Hadracha program this past December. Hadracha (Hebrew for 'guide the way'), is a leadership-training initiative, organized though National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) and Canada Israel Experience (CIE). It brought 12 Hillel members from Toronto university campuses, through a rigorous application process, to Israel for an intensive educational program to better acquaint them with its geo-political and social climate and equipped them with the tools to educate others on campus.

As a student, Meth understands all too well the pressure of a student's work load and other obligations, but he is committed to "at least make others aware of what's going on," he says. And from the long and all-encompassing list of activities Hillel offers such as multi-faith programs and co-sponsorships, Meth is pleased to see new students become active.

"Many more students have gotten involved in last few years, whatever their standpoint," says Meth. "They want answers and information about what's going on. This display of interest, thanks to our wide range of activities, is a great response."

As for Meth's future plans on campus, he hopes to remain active on Hillel's executive board and will definitely remain a member. "The challenge is to be involved and manage everything else life offers," he admits. "I am grateful to the tremendous support from the community without whom we could not do what we do," he says. "Continued support is critical because I see whose coming in to school - first and second year students - and I want to be sure they get involved and stay involved, as I did."

Hillel of Greater Toronto:

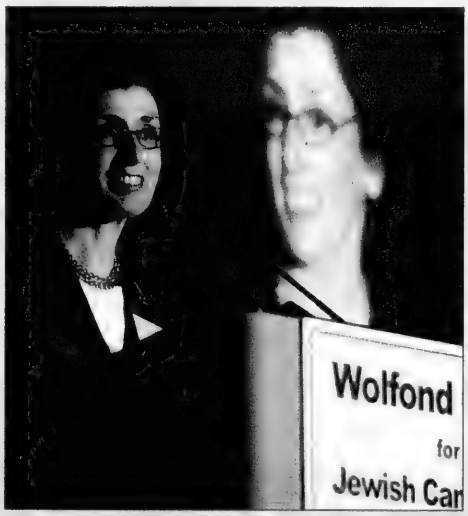
Where it's been; where it's heading

One thing Hillel of Greater Toronto has learned in the past year and half is that advocacy involves much more than a political component, according to Tilly Shames, Hillel's director of Israel Affairs.

"Arts and culture are just as important in promoting Israel's diversity and pluralism," says Shames. "These are all important avenues to reach out to students on campus."

As a result, Hillel has been offering a number of highly successful, original programs that have been attracting students typically not looking to be involved with Hillel. "A number of students are not interested in political programming but are very interested in learning about Israel through a non-political activity so we expanded our programming focus to include sessions with Israeli musicians, authors, Israeli films and filmmakers, to name a few," explains Shames.

The creative initiatives that fall under the mandate of Hillel's Israel Affairs are just a part of the overall effort Hillel has put forth in the last year. One dramatic improvement is Hillel's physical presence at the Wolfond Center for Jewish Campus Life, which opened last May, on the U of T campus. Nearing its first anniversary of operation, the impressive facility has been a draw for new undergraduate and graduate students, staff and faculty alike, says Shames.



Agi Mandel, President of the Board, Hillel of Greater Toronto

And what Shames considers the most effective programming doesn't come cheap. "The best way to provide students with intensive training is through Israel programs. The experience allows for a deeper understanding of issues and strengthens students' abilities to advocate on behalf of Israel," observes Shames. "Leadership and education programming are key areas of investment. Advocacy comes as a result of those two areas."

Agi Mandel, Hillel of Greater Toronto's president, shares Shames' view.

"With our community's focus shifting to campus, we are finally seeing that the community understands the importance of leadership development for our young people at this pivotal moment," she says.

Schechter dean discusses 'Israeli-ization of Masorti'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Harvey Meirovich – a Regina-born, Toronto-raised graduate of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary – has been dean of the rabbinical school at the Masorti movement's Schechter Institute in Jerusalem since 2000.

His predecessor was Rabbi David Golinkin, a native of Arlington, Va., who held the post for a decade and is now president of the institute.

But Rabbi Meirovich, who also has a doctorate in Jewish intellectual history, has no doubt that the next dean will be a "full-fledged Sabra," he said in a recent interview. "It speaks to the Israeli-ization of the institution."

Rabbi Harvey Meirovich

The rabbi was in town earlier this month to speak at a Schechter study day at Beth Tzedec Congregation. Rabbi Golinkin and Converso expert Renee Levine Melammed, assistant dean of the institute and co-ordinator of the school's master's program in Jewish studies and women's studies, were also on the program.

The rabbinical school, which dates back 20 years, has male and female students from a variety of backgrounds, including Russian Israelis and alumni of the Masorti youth movement, NOAM. It also has third-year rabbinical students from the Conservative movement's seminaries in New York, Los Angeles and Buenos Aires, and has ordained one Ethiopian-born rabbi.

The school's mandate has been "to train a generation of Israelis who would be able to speak authentically from Jewish sources, and to address the contemporary social concerns of the country," said Rabbi Meirovich, who made aliyah 15 years ago.

"The mainstream issues we are dealing with are on the agenda of Israeli society today, [such as] tension between morality and power, and issues of social action. How do you get Israelis who feel sometimes more Israeli than Jewish to gain a greater appreciation of their Jewish roots?

"There's a growing recognition among increasing numbers of Israelis, even of a secular bent," he said, "that the elements of religion and spirituality should be incorporated within the culture of the country in a more serious way than it is."

In Israel, the Masorti movement, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement in North America, has 26 congregations with rabbis and at least as many chavurot (prayer groups) that do not have rabbis.

Of the 26 congregations, 23 have rabbis who are Schechter graduates, although as recently as 10 years ago, most of them would have been native English-speakers trained in the United States, said Rabbi Meirovich, who was active as a teen in United Synagogue Youth at Beth Am Congregation (now part of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation) and served in pulpits in Oshawa and at Toronto's Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Partly because of the small number of Israeli congregations, Schechter-trained rabbis are also serving in the Israel Defence Forces and at Jewish community centres, as well as in the TALI school system (which is affiliated with Schechter) and as hospital chaplains.

At the schools, they affect not only students but also teachers and parents, said Rabbi Meirovich.

At JCCs, he noted, they reach out to families who do not attend synagogue.

And as hospital chaplains, they're venturing into a field that "does not exist" in Israel. One of them, who trained as a hospital chaplain in North America, is now training fellow Masorti rabbis as well as colleagues from other denominations as chaplains, and the institute will be developing its own chaplaincy program.

Rabbi Meirovich sees these non-synagogue positions as "kind of a blessing in disguise. If we want to truly penetrate Israeli society with our message of tradition and change, of Judaism and modernity, then we have to look for alternatives [to synagogue pulpits]."

He hopes that over time Israeli society "will come to recognize the value of having an alternative approach to Jewish living and learning," other than that of the predominant Orthodox movement. "Israeli society needs multiple avenues of access."

The rabbi, who will be 58 next month, figures this is a project that will extend "beyond my lifetime."

Aliyah numbers up, says centre's new director

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dina Gidron, new regional director of the Israel Aliyah Centre, has closed a circle.

Born in England, Gidron, 44, made aliyah with her family at age nine, and her mother was involved in helping new olim.

Gidron's husband David, who was a lieutenant-colonel in the Israel Defence Forces before coming to Canada, also made aliyah with his family from New York when he was 13.

"We are an aliyah family. It has always been part of my being. I can help people first-hand because I know what it is like to be a newcomer in Israel, and how good life can be."

Growing up, Gidron was a member of B'nei Akiva, and after her service in the IDF, was a counsellor at Camp Ramah in Canada, and a group leader on the camp's six-week trip to Israel.

She has an executive MBA from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and before taking this position was executive director of a consulting and training company.

"In business, my clients were other companies; I didn't work with consumers. I love working with the end users; it is a very special experience."

She says that a combination of factors have led to an increase in North American aliyah numbers in the past few years, especially through her office, and in Vancouver.

One reason is that Nefesh B'Nefesh Aliyah Services, an organization that provides olim with financial assistance, employment resources, social services and guidance through governmental absorption, has created greater awareness about the possibility of aliyah, she says.

Dina Gidron

"As well, a lot of young people between the ages of 18 and 30 are leaving for Israel, and that is largely due to their experience on Birthright.

"That trip sparked something, and left them craving for more. Some go back to volunteer, or to go to school. Our office deals with that as well."

Another group, she says, are the children of Israelis living in Canada. "They have grown up with the feeling that they want to live in Israel."

This summer, for the first time ever, she says, they are planning a flight specifically for olim from Canada. "We are talking about 200 people, the majority from the [Greater Toronto Area], who came to us and said they feel Jewish and they want to live in the homeland."

Moving to Israel is a big change, she says, "and it is not necessarily an easy change. "There are no job guarantees, and it takes at least a year to settle in, and learn the language and culture. People have to give themselves time.

"In general, however, olim tend to have support systems, and we will help them network. That makes things easier.

"There may be a few hard years, and the standard of life may not be as high, but the quality of life is very high. I want people to understand that. Israel should be seen as a place to make a good life."

As far as security is concerned, she says, "it is hard to describe it when we are here. There is always some element of security; it is something we learn to live with. It is important to have, but we don't dwell on it. For us, seeing soldiers is a way of life."

When people come to her, she says, "I ask them the 'WH' questions – why, when, where, and what are your plans. We talk things through and try to figure out such things as the best time, and what the move means for the children."

Israel offers something very special, says Gidron. "It is a passionate country, for the good and the bad. There is something very special about having children grow up in Israel. It is a gift."

"They grow up with a sense of identity that is different than in [other countries]. Jews are always wandering, but in the end, Israel is there for everyone. My job is to express that."

Working here is a very positive experience, she says. "I have been well received. The Jewish community here is Zionist. People here are responsive. There is a strong connection between our community and Israel."

Correction

Our story last week, "Congress says it's modernizing advocacy function," suggested that Canadian Jewish Congress official Manuel Prutschi said Canada had not adopted the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe's Berlin Declaration against anti-Semitism. In fact, Canada has adopted the Berlin Declaration, and Prutschi should have been quoted as saying that the position of Canadian Jews has been helped by its doing so. The CJN regrets the error.

Tales from the Pale

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Occasionally I stumble onto a Jewish autobiography, memoir or immigrant-centred novel worthy of sharing with CJN readers.

Yesterday, A Memoir of a Russian Jewish Family is just such a book. Originally published in 1939, it is a lovely reminiscence by Miriam Shomer Zunser, the American daughter of Yiddish novelist Nochim-Mayer Shaikevitsch. A second edition, edited by Zunser's granddaughter Emily Wortis Leider, was printed by Harper & Row in 1978.

Zunser's unselfconscious narrative focuses on various members of her family in 19th-century Byelorussia, principally in Pinsk. Some are impoverished, others quite well-to-do. Through a succession of folksy and often remarkable anecdotes, it paints a rich picture of Jewish life in the eastern Pale of Settlement.

Like Gluckl of Hamelyn and other female Jewish family chroniclers, Zunser penned her narrative for her own children and likely had little thought of publication. She reveals an amazing knowledge of family events that occurred decades before she was born. I liked her book from the moment I read its opening sentence: "Your great-grandfather had 24 children, all by the same wife."

Many tales concern Zunser's illustrious great-grandfather, Reb Michel Bercinsky. He once rescued the Pinsk shul from an onerous tax burden by taking the government to court; he gained the respect even of local thieves who abided by a gentleman's agreement never to break into his house.

Yet more memorable episodes are centred around her father, the gifted and prolific Shaikevitsch (Shomer), whose Yiddish romances eventually fell from popular and critical favour. However, space allows me to convey only one of Zunser's rich anecdotes, concerning her paternal grandfather, Reb Gavriel Goldberg of Nesvizh.

A wealthy businessman who exported goods and raw materials around the Baltic, Reb Gavriel had reached the allotted biblical life span of 70 with still no offspring. He yearned for a a son to say Kaddish for him after his death. His plan to divorce his wife and seek a young bride stirred the rabbis of Nesvizh to debate. Jewish law permitted a man to divorce a barren wife after 10 years, but the rabbis forbade Reb Gavriel from divorcing because too much time had gone by. "Reb Gavriel had waited almost 50 years, and it was too late," Zunser recounted.

Undaunted, Reb Gavriel found a rabbi in another town who would grant the divorce; even though his wife refused to receive the get into her hands, he proceeded with a second marriage a few months later. Reb Nochim-Mayer, the rabbi who had decreed the divorce, now officiated at his wedding – and startled everyone present by raising his hands to heaven and proclaiming:

"'If this union has come about against the will and law of God, may it prove barren as the sands of the desert! If, however, I have acted according to the teachings of our lawgivers and the will of the Almighty, may it be blessed with many children and may even you, Reb Gavriel, together with your wife, live to marry off the youngest of your offspring!'

Then he commanded the wide-eyed wedding guests to say Amen. "'Amen!' they whispered in secret foreboding."

Watched by every Jewish eye in Nesvizh, Reb Gavriel's petrified young bride soon became pregnant. Hearing the news, his first wife accepted the get and the money he provided, and went off to Palestine to die. "She could not give one child to her people; she would give her bones to mix with the dust of their land."

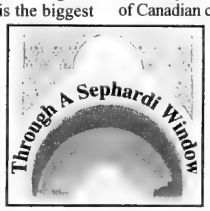
Reb Gavriel's second wife ultimately produced nearly a dozen sons and daughters, and he indeed lived to see the youngest of his offspring married. He died soon after at the age of 110, with no shortage of sons to say Kaddish for his departed soul.

English – an immigrant's biggest hurdle

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the arrival of the first Moroccan immigrants to Canada. The following article is part of a series about one family's story.

For an immigrant, the challenge of learning a new language is the biggest obstacle to overcome. Without the ability to communicate, one's employment options are naturally limited to the absolute bottom rung. Indeed, even the most menial of jobs require some sort of English-language skills.



Simple everyday tasks such as asking directions to a washroom or purchasing a coffee can be daunting if not downright humiliating to a newcomer. Imagine going to the barber, and being unable to give directions except for those in sign language, then coming home practically hairless.

Learning to speak English as a second language was the number 1 priority for Sephardi immigrants. For most of them, English was actually a third or fourth language.

There is a relationship between one's age and one's ability to absorb a new language. The sad reality is that the older you are the more difficult it is. As a child, I acquired a reasonable grasp of English within three months of my arrival. Adults, on the other hand, would repeatedly enrol in six-month sessions of government-sponsored classes and still be mystified by the language.

With my knowledge of English, I became the family interpreter. Weekly, my mother and I would head downtown, boarding the subway for those meccas of Canadian consumerism – Eaton's and Simpson's. There I would proudly stand between my mother and the saleswomen and translate English and Spanish. One day, however, my poor mother needed help in purchasing lingerie. Here I immaturely drew the line and categorically refused to translate. I am now ashamed to state that even my mother's tears wouldn't make that little boy budge.

When learning English, immigrants may feel that they have finally familiarized themselves with a new word, but then they discover that the very language that they have mastered has betrayed them. For example, it was taught that "left" was the opposite of "right." Fine. Then, the next day "left" was taught in the context of "he left the room"! "Right" was the opposite of "left." Okay. Then "right" became "correct," as in right and wrong. Unquestionably, this was some sort of conspiracy against all immigrants.

Not only did one have to master the meaning of language, but then there was the issue of pronunciation. What might have sounded flawlessly accurate to one's own ear was a patent giveaway to our class that we were newcomers. The "th" sound was difficult and "thank you" came out as "tank you." The difference between the "ch" sound and the "sh" was hard to master. "Chicken shears" came out as "shicken chears." An accent was not seen as a note of distinction but it was an instant identification of perceived inferiority; one that kept many immigrants silently smiling instead of revealing their status by responding.

Verbal communication was one thing, reading was another. In school as a 10-year-old, I was fascinated by my classmate who would read the Hardy Boys books, whose pages were full of text. As for me, I would select Curious George and Dr. Seuss. At the same time, many an adult immigrant was intently tuning into every episode of Sesame Street, happily singing the numbers as well as the ABC's along with Bert and Ernie.

I must say that I was personally, singularly lucky. Every afternoon I was taken out of class by the school principal. In his office, for what seemed an eternity, he would toil with me to articulate English without a trace of an accent. Blowing air while lightly biting my tongue, I learned that mysterious "th" sound. Endlessly puckering my lips, I would say "ow" as in cow and so on. Doctor Dolittle, I am forever grateful.

In due course, everyone, possibly with the exception of the homebound elderly, learned English. Accents hang around, but who cares.

Jews do have mythology

Books
Bernard Baskin

Tree of Souls: The Mythology of Judaism* by Howard Schwartz, illustrated by Caren Loebel-Fried, Oxford University Press.

This book, the first anthology of its kind, represents an extraordinary scholarly achievement. The author has selected nearly 700 Jewish myths from a wide variety of sources: Hebrew scriptures, Talmud and midrash, kabbalistic literature, medieval folklore, chassidic texts and the Apocrypha.

In his helpful and impressive introduction, Schwartz points out that the Bible is written in a manner that is often compact, concise and even cryptic. What results is the development of elaborate interpretation and out of such interpretation comes mythology in its many forms.

For each myth selected, Schwartz includes extensive commentary in which he discusses how the myth relates to others, if there are any comparable myths in world literature and how Jewish mythology remains distinct and singular.

The book is divided into 10 large segments: myths of God, myths of creation, myths of heaven, myths of hell, myths of the Holy Word, myths of the Holy Time, myths of the Holy People, myths of the Holy Land, myths of exile and myths of the messiah.

This beautifully produced, oversized volume shatters the widespread notion that Jews have no mythology – an erroneous idea based on the belief that, as a monotheistic religion, Judaism could not include material about pagan deities, the warfare of gods and a strange mélange of angels and demons, spirits and vampires, grotesque beasts and the golem.

What follows are a number of myths – and because of space limitations – without the author's often fascinating annotations.

The volume includes a 40-page selected English bibliography, as well as a bibliography of original sources.

• The Origin of the Shema. When the hour drew near for Jacob to take leave of this world, he called his sons together and said to them, "Do you have any doubts that God spoke and the world came into being?" They replied, "Hear, O Israel, our father. Just as you have no doubts that God spoke and the world came into being, so too do we have no doubts. Surely, The Lord, our God, the Lord is one" (Deuteronomy 6:4). That is why it is still said, to this day, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one." And that is how the prayer of the Shema was created.

• The Stone from Mount Sinai. All the stones used in the building of the Temple in Jerusalem were from Jerusalem and its mountains. Only one stone was brought from somewhere else – from Mount Sinai. It was put in the Kotel, the Western Wall of the Temple. And that is why only the Kotel was not destroyed and remained standing when the Temple was destroyed, because that stone was from the holy mountain on which the Torah was given.

• How the Dead Will Come to Life. How will the dead come to life? God will take the Great Shofar in His hand and blow on it seven times, and its sound will go forth from one end of the world to the other. At the first blast, the whole world will shake and suffer the pangs of the messiah. At the second blast, dust will be scattered over the face of the earth and the graves will open. At the third, the bones will gather together. At the fourth, the limbs will stretch out. At the fifth, skin will be stretched over them. At the sixth, spirits and souls will enter the bodies. At the seventh, God Himself will raise and resuscitate them and make them stand on their feet.

• The Hand of God. The Temple in Jerusalem had been set on fire, and the moment of destruction had arrived. The High Priest went up to the roof, the keys of the Temple in his hand. There he called out, "Master of the Universe! The time has come to return these keys to You." Then he threw the keys high into the air, and at that instant a hand reached down from above and caught them, and brought them back into heaven.

Howard Schwartz, a renowned collector of traditional Jewish tales, is professor of English at the University of Missouri-St. Louis. He is the editor of Elijah's Violin & Other Jewish Fairy Tales, Miriam's Tambourine: Jewish Folktales from Around the World and Lilith's Cave: Jewish Tales of the Supernatural.

Celebrating the completion of the Talmud

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On Tuesday, March 1, the 20th day of Adar I, 5765, thousands of people around the world will celebrate as they finish studying the 73rd page of Tractate Niddah and thereby complete their study of the Talmud. The very next day, they will begin learning the first tractate of the Talmud, Berachot. And they will continue in this shared learning experience until the entire Talmud is completed on Thursday, the 14th of Av, 5772 (Aug. 2, 2012)!

In the 1920s, Rabbi Meir Shapiro, the Lubliner Rav of Poland, had a groundbreaking idea: to unite Jews around the globe by having each of them study exactly the same text of Talmud on a daily basis. By reading a double-page (daf) a day (yomi), they would complete the Talmud's 2,711 double pages in approximately seven years. [http://dafyomi.shemayisrael.co.il/dafyomi.htm]

Rabbi Shapiro's vision has caught on. When the 10th Daf Yomi cycle was completed on Sept. 28, 1997, 26,000 people crowded into New York's Madison Square Garden to be linked by satellite with dozens of communities around the world. [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk970926/usny.htm] An estimated 70,000 people were celebrating learning the daily Daf for about an hour a day over a span of seven years – before starting all over again. You can watch a brief video online from the 1997 celebration. [http://tinyurl.com/4o3xe]

Written in Hebrew and Aramaic, the Talmud is the often-terse compendium of law, logic and philosophy that became the foundation for modern Judaism. In Discovering the Talmud, Dr. Eric Chevlen does a very good job of explaining the importance of the Talmud, its component sections of Mishnah and Gemarah, as well as his own early challenges in learning a daf a day. [http://tinyurl.com/3jr2q] For more detail about the character and structure of the Talmud, check out Gerald Marvin Phillips' doctoral thesis on "Rhetoric" at Talmudic Academies. [http://tinyurl.com/57oxh]

Without a doubt, the best way to learn Talmud is under the guidance of a teacher or with a knowledgeable friend. But there are many online resources that can also help. The premier Daf Yomi site on the Web belongs to the Dafyomi Advancement Forum. [http://www.dafyomi.co.il]

This incredible site includes easy-to-follow links to the commentary on that day's Daf Yomi in addition to hundreds of pages of archives. There are brief biographies of some of the key commentators, charts and question and answer sections. [http://www.dafyomi.co.il/central.htm]

I was intrigued to learn that the Dafyomi Advancement Forum was created by Kollel Iyun Hadaf of Har Nof, Jerusalem, where Rabbi Mordecai Kornfeld and the other scholars "study the daf in depth in the mornings and work on their computers in the afternoons." [http://www.dafyomi.co.il/kollel/kollel.htm]

The latest Daf Yomi class can be as close as your e-mail box. Several Daf Yomi e-mail lists are available and they are all free. You can start learning Daf Yomi at any time and can join up to six lists including "Insights to the Daf," "Point-by-Point Summary of the Daf" and "Discuss the Daf with the Kollel." [http://www.dafyomi.co.il/subscribe.htm] Ohr Somayach in Jerusalem offers a Daf Yomi list. [http://www.ohr.org.il/web/sub.htm]

Why do so many people drag themselves out of bed, day in and day out, year after year, to learn the Talmud? Herman Wouk, author of This is My God and The Winds of War, explains why he made the commitment: [http://www.ohr.org.il/web/yomi.htm]

"Because by now the Talmud is in my bones. Its elegant and arcane ethical algebra, its soaked-in quintessential Jewishness, its fun, its difficulty, its accumulative virtue all balance against the cost in time and the so-called 'remoteness from reality.' Above and beyond all its other intellectual and cultural values, the Talmud is, for people like us, 'identity,' pure and ever springing."

Associated grad goes back to school as principal

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eric Golombek didn't hesitate when he was offered the position of principal at Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns Education Centre, which runs from preschool to Grade 5.

"Toronto is home," he said in a recent interview at the 300-student branch on Neptune Drive, which he will join for the coming academic year.

A 1985 graduate of Associated, Golombek taught in Pittsburgh for eight years and is currently in Israel completing a master's degree in education from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. He said he will be returning "to a place I really care about and feel closely connected to."

Golombek will replace Rosalie Sniderman, his former principal, who is retiring as the branch's general studies principal in June. He will, however, direct both general and Judaic studies in the newly created position. Betty Katzman, Judaic studies principal, will stay on as co-principal of the Judaic studies program.

On a two-week visit last month, Golombek was struck by a sense of community at the school, something he doesn't recall from his own childhood.

"There were times I loved it and times I didn't," he said of the school. "I was a regular kid."

What did impress him was Associated's commitment, still ongoing, to Ivrit B'Ivrit (teaching Judaic Studies in Hebrew).

By doing so, the school is bucking a trend, Golombek said. "It's a discussion in the American day schools – how committed are we to teaching Hebrew, and to what ends? In a lot of schools, teaching Hebrew is about what kind of skills [and] what kind of language kids need to know in order to approach Jewish texts, or to feel connected to the land of Israel. But not necessarily to be able to speak Hebrew."

Eric Golombek

Ironically, when Golombek was a high school student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, he decided that, although he wanted to be a teacher and was religiously observant, he definitely did not want to enter Jewish education.

He wanted to combine his love of math – which he studied at the University of Waterloo before heading to the University of Western Ontario for his B.Ed. – with his affinity for working with kids, based on his experience as a counsellor at Camp Shalom and a youth leader at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

But his focus shifted after he moved to Pittsburgh, where his wife Adina (née Petroff, a Grade 3 classmate at Associated) was pursuing a PhD in chemistry. The couple now has three young sons.

Teaching general studies at a Jewish day school in Pittsburgh, Golombek "got involved in an informal way in the Jewish mission of the school," helping out with tfillah, running the tfillin club and working on holiday programming.

Later, as head of Hebrew and Judaic studies at the Community Day School (Pittsburgh's Solomon Schechter school, affiliated with the Conservative movement), he undertook a research project in which he revamped the middle school tfillah program, offering an unprecedented choice of four types of services, based on input from the students on what was meaningful to them.

"Up until recently, in the educational community at large, people haven't really cared what kids think about things," Golombek said. "There [was] a sense that 'we know what kids need to know to be successful'... without a lot of consideration for what kids care about, the way they think, what's important to them and what they believe in.

"I think slowly that's changed in education, and I think that needs to be reflected in Jewish education. It's not good enough to teach [only] the technical aspects of tfillah. All those things are really important, but it's not enough... The amazing thing we found was that the kids really were very different, and not in the way we predicted."

The idea of involving students in creating programs does not apply only to tfillah, he noted. "I think the voices of children do need to be heard."

Heeb magazine speaks to the 'New Jew'

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

For those wondering why some young Jews don't identify with Judaism the way their parents do, Joshua Neuman, the editor and publisher of Heeb magazine, has insight into the behaviour of the "New Jew."

Hillel of Greater Toronto and Beth Tikvah Jewish Education Centre recently invited Neuman to be the second speaker in a series of lectures called "Being Jewish On Campus," and talked about the interests of the young generation of North American Jews.

Heeb: The New Jew Review, a magazine that is gaining popularity with every issue, targets Jews in their 20s and 30s who may not see themselves as being religiously observant, but still feel a connection to being Jewish.

"Heeb challenges mainstream conceptions of Jewish identity and tests the boundaries of Jewish and popular cultures," Neuman said. "The Jewish content isn't just klezmer and bar mitzvahs and grandma's chicken soup, although it includes all that."

Although the magazine has only been up and running since 2002, it already has a readership of 125,000.

Neuman, 31, who is a graduate of Brown University and the Harvard Divinity school and teaches philosophy of religion at New York University, attributes the magazine's success to its ability to reach out to the New Jew.

If Neuman's look is any indication of what his magazine has to offer, this publication will have something for most Jews.

He emits a shy, boyish charm, and seems to be uncomfortable speaking in front of a crowd.

His black-framed glasses and messy bed-head, his tendency to trip over his words and fidget with his hair – you'd expect him to sound like Woody Allen. Instead, what you get is what Barry White would sound like if he was Jewish and had a cold.

As his deep voice emanated through his small frame, it became apparent that his publication was a reflection of himself.

"Heeb has clearly tapped into something much larger than do most magazines of our size," Neuman says.

His willingness to cover anything, from the legendary rappers the Beastie Boys and Bubbelicious (a marijuana plant) to a feature about the "Jewish divas of south Florida," is what has drawn its audience to the magazine.

But because Heeb veers in a different direction than mainstream Jewish press, he has received criticism from Jews with all kinds of political concerns.

"The academics say we should be more scholarly, while rabbis tell us we should be more inclusive of the religious text, Yiddish enthusiasts say we should publish less about other people's culture and more about authentic Jewish culture. Frat boys have said we are too political – we should just stick to the grandma jokes. Zionists reamed us for being too sympathetic to the Palestinians and radical activists said that we were not critical enough of Israel," he said.

But Neuman thinks it is because he doesn't take the publication so seriously that young Jews are intrigued by it.

He jokes about the non-traditional way his editorial board, some of whom are Orthodox and some Reform, come to make decisions about what kinds of things to print.

"I have to tell you, it's not so systematic. It's basically once a month, over lots of beer, and us telling jokes and just thinking about the conversations we've had with our friends, the art we've seen, the disappointment we've had with other media on how they reported on things," Neuman said.

He said the mistake that the mainstream Jewish press is making is attempting to engage young Jews by emphasizing that Judaism is in peril.

"Whether it is framed in the context of anti-Semitism, intermarriage or Israel's vulnerability – this isn't a normative claim, but an empirical claim – the New Jew, our audience, isn't moved, Jewishly, by these things."

He says it is because the young generation has been largely unscathed by anti-Semitism and have enjoyed an upward class drift over the past 50 years, with a third of millionaires in America being Jewish.

Neuman referred to a study conducted by the Charles Bronfman Foundation in 2001 to illustrate the opinions of young Jews.

"As for Israel, the audience is torn about Israel. They have multi-faceted views. Twenty-six per cent say they are confused, 42 per cent are sympathetic to the Palestinians, 65 per cent are sympathetic to the Israelis and only 21 per cent consider themselves strongly connected to Zionism," he said.

When they were asked about what it means to be Jewish, they focused more on the family aspect than the religious one.

"Ninety-six per cent of those surveyed said they were proud to be Jewish. Of these 96 per cent, most viewed being Jewish in terms of culture and family rather than religion and spirituality," Neuman said.

With his magazine, he hopes to engage as many Jews as he can, but doesn't want to force the religion onto his readers.

"I'm not trying to change anybody," he said. "We are not trying to bring Jews back home. We're creating a forum where the young demographic see themselves, hear their voices. We do push buttons and I don't expect everyone to like it. As long as I'm confident that we're not shocking for the sake of shocking, I'll take risks."

Obituary

'Lehrer' Rubinov remembered

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – When Leo (Leib) Rubinov died on on Feb. 5 at age 89, family and friends said it marked not only the passing of a man, but the end of an era.

"Lehrer" Rubinov, they acknowledged, was one of the last figures from the founding generation of educators at the Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools (JPPS) who gave generations of students a love of learning, a lifelong appreciation of Yiddishkeit and an unshakable moral compass rooted in an immutable sense of what it means to be Jewish.

A Holocaust survivor who saw all but one sibling perish, Rubinov, unlike some of his contemporaries, never seemed embittered by the experience, his colleagues and family said.

On the contrary, they said, it served as his inspiration.

If any teacher could be described as a Jewish version of Mr. Chips, they suggested, it was Rubinov: he always had a twinkle in his eyes and a smile on his face. He had a wry sense of humour and was gentle and humble to a fault.

Until his recent illness, Rubinov, a widower for 14 years, lived an active, independent life, remaining interested in activities at the school and a devoted parent and grandparent.

In early December, Rubinov had a seat of honour at a party celebrating JPPS's 90th birthday.

"He was just a wonderful, loving guy," said Merle Frankel, former executive director of JPPS. "He brought to the school and students a sense of loving acceptance."

This sentiment was echoed at his funeral service, where pews were filled with generations of former students, colleagues and admirers.

"He was a master teacher, enthusiastic and devoted," close friend and former colleague at JPPS, Edmond Elbaz, said in his eulogy.

Describing Rubinov's ritual when entering the classroom, Elbaz said, "he would carefully remove his jacket and place it on the back of his chair, roll up his sleeves and take a piece of chalk in his hand."

Rubinov was born on March 30, 1915, in the Lithuanian shtetl of Vilkavishkis near the German border, the second of five children. His parents, Hersh and Dvora, had suffered from the death of one son prior to Leo's birth. When Rubinov was 17, his father died.

Rubinov attended the Tarbut Hebrew school, and although he showed talent in mathematics and engineering, he did not have the opportunity to complete a degree while attending gymnasium. But he did tutor privately in Hebrew and math.

After the Germans invaded Lithuania in the spring of 1941, the Rubinov family, like thousands of other Lithuanian Jews, were brought to the Kovno ghetto and eventual death. Younger brother Yaacov was murdered in a mass shooting in 1941; sister Chaya died in the Kovno ghetto in 1944. In 1945, younger sister Lena died of typhoid fever in a concentration camp. Their mother died in Auschwitz.

Leo and his younger sister Mali, now 83, survived a death march towards Bavaria after being evacuated from Dachau. They were freed by American soldiers.

After the war, Rubinov was interned in a displaced persons camp near Munich and came to Canada in 1948 with his sister. Mali came to Toronto, Rubinov to Montreal.

Soon after he arrived, Rubinov secured a job substituting for a teacher at what was then the Jewish People's School, and didn't leave until his retirement in 1990 at age 75, when he was vice-principal of Jewish Studies.

At the funeral, it was noted that after the Holocaust, Rubinov had vowed never to have children, but the experience of teaching children just after the war and again in Canada changed his mind.

"It was therapeutic," his son Chaim said. In 1951, he married Miriam, who died in 1991.

Rubinov was survived by his sons and sister Mali, as well as by three grandchildren and two step-grandchildren.

Of occupations and conspiracy theories

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In the deluge of reports on the Feb. 14 assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri, the major media outlets paid scant attention to claims, emanating mainly from Syria and Iran, that Israel was behind the attack. But significantly, in contrast to coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the mainstream sources often avoided using the term "occupation" to describe Syria's role in Lebanon.

On CBC (The National, Feb. 14), Nahlah Ayed explained that Hariri had spent 10 of the last 14 years as prime minister and was widely credited for rebuilding Lebanon and providing stability following more than a decade of civil war.

Said Ayed: "Hariri quit his post last fall when Syria pressured parliament to extend the term of a pro-Syrian President [Emile Lahoud]. Remaining an MP, Hariri was counted among the opposition, many of whom openly called for Syria to withdraw its troops from Lebanon. There's been growing opposition to Syria's continued military and political dominance here, and last year, the U.N. Security Council added its voice to many calling on Syria to pull out [Resolution 1559, Sept. 2]."

Beyond her use of the term "dominance" rather than "occupation," Ayed's report was accurate and fair.

By Feb. 15, most media had reported that most Lebanese explicitly blamed Syria for Hariri's assassination. There was little or no mention of Israel.

In its extensive Feb. 15 coverage, the New York Times also avoided the term "occupation." In a front-page story, Hassan Fattah in Beirut wrote about "Syria's continuing influence" in Lebanon. Reporting from Washington, D.C., Steven Weisman wrote about "Syria's domination of Lebanon." The term "occupation" was attributed to the U.S. government: "The Treasury Department also moved to freeze assets of Syrians with ties to terrorists, lethal weapons or the Lebanon occupation." Even the Times editorial, "Hit Job in Beirut," referred only to Syria's long-term "presence" in Lebanon.

An exception to this usage was Tom Kennedy on CTV National News (Feb. 14), who said that Syria's military "occupies and dominates Lebanon."

This double standard was highlighted by Globe and Mail columnist Marcus Gee ("It's time we all said 'Syria out!'" Feb. 16). Wrote Gee: "The Arab press loves to fulminate against the U.S. occupation of Iraq, and Arab leaders have been condemning the Israeli occupation of Palestine for decades... But one notable example of foreign occupation has left the Arab world unmoved. Syria's occupation of Lebanon, an Arab-on-Arab affair, is surely one of the most blatant anywhere in the world."

UN Security Council Resolution 1559 orders all foreign forces out of Lebanon without precondition, thereby making Syria's presence "illegal." But Israel's "occupation" of disputed territories is legal because UN Security Council Resolution 242 states (as has been noted often in this column) that the withdrawal of Israeli forces from territory captured in a war of self-defence in 1967 is conditional on peace and security guarantees from Israel's neighbours.

Francis Wheen's book Idiot Proof: Deluded Celebrities, Irrational Power Brokers, Media Morons and the Erosion of Common Sense takes on people who promote conspiracy theories.

Wheen would have a field day with columnist Eric Margolis, who has been strongly implying – based on a totally unfounded theory – that Israel poisoned the late Palestinian president Yasser Arafat (CTV, Canada AM, Feb. 7, and in his regular Toronto Sun column, "Palestinian caution is warranted," Feb. 13).

On CTV, Margolis said that, along with many Palestinians, he is "suspicious" of Israel's involvement in Arafat's death. This is something Margolis truly believes – apparently because he wants to. Evidence and proof, the bedrock of rationality, are of no concern.

A severe critic of Israel and its alliance with the United States, Margolis is well-known for plying conspiracy theories that appeal to the most gullible. Why he continues to be a featured analyst on mainstream networks is puzzling.

Belleville shul reunion to mark 50th anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Calling all Bellevillians and former Bellevillians to the 50th reunion of the "new" Sons of Jacob Congregation.

The reunion takes place in the city of Belleville on the June 3 weekend, and includes a full program to celebrate the building's 50th anniversary.

In 1955, 65 Jewish families looked at their old-fashioned synagogue, which was then in downtown Belleville beside the railway tracks, and decided they needed a new building. They picked Belleville's east end for the site of the new shul they built.

Paula Freeman, a member of the reunion organizing committee, said that although the old synagogue was filled only on High Holy Days, "the community was blessed with enough children to fill a cheder and Sunday school."

The new building was close to the public schools, and convenient for parents who dropped off and picked up their children.

The new Sons of Jacob Congregation building included a sanctuary, classrooms and a large, flexible space to accommodate community events.

"The building is still being used, although not as fully, and there is no longer a full-time rabbi and the cheder/Sunday school is small," says Freeman.

Brenda (Black) Goldstein and Paul Yanover are the Toronto reunion chairs. The reunion committee includes current and former shul members as well as former students of the cheder and Sunday school. Some of them were the first children to use the building 50 years ago.

Committee member Jan (Saltz) Charendoff says that it was "a very close community. We did many things together. During the war, the women of the synagogue would prepare meals for the Jewish servicemen stationed at nearby Trenton Air Force base, and the airmen were often invited to the synagogue for services."

Paul Yanover says, "We, who were the Jewish youth of Belleville, were very excited awaiting the opening of our new shul 50 years ago. It was a modern building situated away from downtown.

"Now as the 50th anniversary approaches, we are looking forward to returning to our roots – small-town Ontario – to renewing old friendships and reliving the good old days."

Other reunion committee members include Carole and Norm Albert, Stan Albert, Laurie Banks, Ethel and Joe Burke (the president of Sons of Jacob Synagogue), Isabel Freemen, Sarah (Kamel) Glick, Judy (Yanover) Horowitz, Eleanor Jourard, Debby (Shulman) Kaplan, Harry Tuchmayer and Barbara Yanover.

For more information, call Brenda Goldstein at 416-491-7986, e-mail, Goldstein7986@rogers.com, call Paul Yanover at 416-927-0295 or e-mail epy@interlog.com.

Jihad websites removed from computer

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

RackForce Wholesale Hosting Solutions, an Internet company in Kelowna, B.C., has removed six sites from its computers that promoted jihad and vilified Jews.

One of the websites, www.shareeah.org, had connections to Hamas, the Palestinian terrorist organization and was being investigated by the RCMP. Operated by Abu Hamza Al-Misri, a terrorism suspect in prison in Britain and waiting deportation to the United States, the site promoted and supported suicide bombing.

Once the company determined it violated its acceptable use policy, RackForce decided to remove it along with five other sites a European reseller had placed with it, said Randall Robinson, the company's web service manager.

RackForce sold the server space through the reseller and was not aware of their contents until they were brought to its attention, Robinson said.

The other sites that were removed were www.islaam-online.net, www.jewstoislam.com, www.worldofislam.us, www.newsuncovered.org and www.al-thabaat.com.

"Most of the sites were terrorist-oriented," said Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. "One of the sites extolled the virtues of suicide bombing."

Robinson said an American terrorism-monitoring organization, the SITE Institute, first brought shareeah.org to its attention and the Wiesenthal Centre identified the other websites. He said that even though they had lost their Canadian host, they were back, up and running on a server in Chicago.

"That fact suggests they've been bouncing this around for a long period of time," he said.

Adler said while Canadian companies are generally co-operative in removing these kinds of sites, there are numerous options available for terror groups outside the country. "I urge the Canadian government to lead the way to evolve an international effort to stop terror sites," he said.

"The problem with the Internet is precisely its biggest advantage. It's free, easily accessible and virtually unregulated. With all those wonderful things, that aspect allows terrorist and hate groups to prosper," Adler stated.

Robinson said it is extremely difficult to monitor and regulate content on the web. "Better to allow this to pop up in Canada so the RCMP and CSIS (the Canadian Security Intelligence Service) can gather information." It would be more difficult to monitor these sites if they were placed on computers in places like Asia, he added.

RackForce has about 80,000 websites on its servers.

COIN DRIVE: Students, parents and staff at Leo Baeck Day School's Atkinson campus recently held a four-day coin drive for tsunami relief. In one week, they collected dimes on Tuesday, quarters on Wednesday, loonies on Thursday and toonies on Friday. At an assembly of almost 600 students, Barbara Barak of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto was presented with a cheque for more than $5,400 for the federation's tsunami relief fund.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Healthy and low-carb? It's as easy at 1-2-3

By NORENE GILLETZ

Rozanne Gold believes in simplicity when it comes to cooking. A professional chef, Gold is the best-selling author of nine cookbooks, including the award-winning "1-2-3" series of three-ingredient cookbooks. She firmly believes in using the best and freshest ingredients possible, then treats them simply to achieve delicious, fabulous results.

Her latest cookbook in this series is Low-Carb 1-2-3 published by Rodale. You'll find 225 simple, satisfying recipes that meet the guidelines of all the current low-carb and good carb diet plans, including Atkins, South Beach and the Glycemic Index diets. Every dish is also low in calories and saturated fat, making it easy to incorporate it into any weight-loss program and ideal for those who want to eat healthy food that also tastes great! Gold worked with registered dietitian Helen Kimmel to provide the nutritional information for this book.

They kept the recipes under 399 calories for main courses; under 199 calories for soups, vegetables, side dishes and desserts; under 275 calories for first courses and breakfasts. The "Carbs That Count" feature gives readers a quick tally of actual carbs consumed. Additional features include tips for stocking the 1-2-3 kitchen, a selection of 50 low-carb snacks, 50 low-carb menus and a reference list ranking carb-smart (and not-so-smart) foods.

Gold says you should not make substitutions unless you've tried a dish first to understand its intention – the flavour, texture and presentation. Keep in mind that altering a recipe could change its nutritional analysis. If you change one ingredient, you've changed 1/3 of the recipe!

The book contains lots of wonderful ideas for dishes that can be easily adapted for the kosher cook. You'll be delighted to discover that satisfying, low-carb meals are as easy as 1-2-3. Enjoy…

SMOKED SALMON PATÉ WITH PITA CRISPS

Rozanne Gold wanted to create a creamy non-dairy party dish and so she tried Tofutti spread, a soy-based cream cheese look-alike. It turns out to be a great flavour-carrier. No one will know the difference and you can serve this very-low carb dish at a kosher meal. Crisp pita chips add a nice textural contrast. Choose a heavily smoked salmon for this recipe. (This also would be a terrific breakfast or brunch dish!)

3 ounces smoked salmon
8 ounces Tofutti
2 whole wheat pitas (6-in. diameter)

Cut the salmon into large pieces and place it in a food processor with the Tofutti. Process until thoroughly blended. Add salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste and mix. Transfer to a bowl and refrigerate until cold.

Preheat oven to 350. Cut each pita into 8 wedges. Separate each pita wedge into 2 triangles. Place the pita triangles, inside side up, on a baking sheet. Bake for 5 to 6 minutes, until crisp. (Do not let them get too brown.) Remove them from the oven and let cool.

To serve, put a heaping teaspoon of smoked salmon "paté" on each pita crisp and place it on a decorative plate. Serves 16 (2 pieces per serving).

3.24 g carbs that count, 3.87 g total carbs, .63 g fibre, 4.56 g total fat, 1.12 g sat. fat, 2.37 g protein, 65 calories.

PESTO-PISTACHIO CHILEAN SEA BASS

This is a show-stopper: brilliantly white fish blanketed with a crunchy, green crust. Buy a really good pesto sauce (or make your own). You can substitute a thick fillet of halibut, which is another firm, white fish, or even a thick fillet of salmon.

2½ pounds Chilean sea bass, in 1 piece
1 cup shelled unsalted pistachios
¾ cup prepared pesto

Preheat the oven to 400. Line a rimmed baking sheet with parchment paper or foil. Using tweezers, remove any bones running down the centre of the fish. Lightly season both sides of the fish with salt and place it on the baking sheet.

In a food processor, process the pistachios until coarsely ground. (Do not overprocess; you want small, discernible pieces, not powder.)

Thickly spread the pesto on top of the fish to coat it completely, draining most of the oil from the pesto as you go. Dust the fish with freshly ground black pepper. Pack the pistachios onto the pesto to cover evenly and press down lightly to obtain a thick nut crust.

Bake the fish for 35 to 40 minutes, or until the fish reaches the desired doneness. (Do not overcook; it is important to keep the fish moist and juicy.) Remove the fish from the oven, transfer it to a large warm platter and serve immediately. Serves 6.

Nutritionist's Notes: While shopping for prepared pesto, compare labels and use the brand with the least amount of fat. Pistachios in their shell make a great snack. Thirty of them have only 5 grams of "calories that count" and shelling them yourself makes them last a long time.

FROZEN HOT CHOCOLATE

This slushy drink/dessert was derived from one made famous at New York's Serendipity restaurant. You need to serve it with both a spoon and a straw.

½ cup unsweetened Dutch process cocoa
¼ cup granulated sugar substitute
2½ cups 1% milk

Up to 1 day before you plan to serve, in a medium saucepan and using a small strainer, sift the cocoa to remove any lumps. Add the sugar substitute and ½ cup of the milk and stir to form a smooth paste. Using a whisk, slowly add the remaining 2 cups milk and cook over medium heat, whisking constantly, until the ingredients are thoroughly incorporated and the mixture is smooth, 2 to 3 minutes. Let cool, then pour the mixture into an ice cube tray and freeze for a minimum of 8 hours.

Before serving, put the blender canister in the freezer to chill for 1 hour. Remove the frozen cubes and add to the chilled blender canister. Add 2 tbsp. water and, beginning on low speed, break up the cubes, then increase to high speed and process until smooth and slushy. (This will take several minutes.) Serve immediately in frozen coffee cups or chilled wine glasses.

'He lived to love and he lived to give'

The following is the victim statement made to the court on Feb. 16, by Chavi Rosenzweig, David Rosenzweig's widow.

Your Honour:

I would like to thank the judicial system for giving me the opportunity to express my feelings and thoughts, on this, the final day of the legal process surrounding the murder of my husband, David Rosenzweig.

As well, I would like to take this opportunity to express our overwhelming gratitude to the legal professionals and the police department who have extended themselves so generously, selflessly, kindly and thoughtfully to our family. We appreciate your efforts ever so much. Thank you.

We could not have reached this day, standing where we are, without the comfort, assistance and caring of so many people. On behalf of my children and family, I would like to express our gratitude to the community of Greater Toronto for helping us survive our nightmare and for showing great generosity of spirit and compassion.

I would like to commend the Jewish community of Toronto and around the world for its grace, dignity and sensitivity in dealing with the senseless murder of my husband David z"l. The sense of brotherhood we have experienced with our fellow Jews worldwide, is truly heartwarming, comforting and a source of strength for us.

And of course, I will always hold close to my heart the strength, courage, bravery and kindness extended to us by our exceptional family, friends and David's colleagues and clients. I cannot imagine how one survives such an ordeal without the level of support we have been blessed to receive.

Your Honour:

I stand before you today to honour my husband David Rosenzweig z"l, a mensch, a gentleman. To me, he was the eighth wonder of the world. He was a gentle and loving man. He represented the universal Jew and the universal human being at his best.

David, in his short 49 years, showed us by his example, the potential to create peace and harmony through a commitment to kindness, honesty, goodness, self-respect and respect for others.

Indeed, I was honoured to create a world – our own microcosm – together with David and our children for almost 25 years. David was a man who strove to harmonize all aspects of his life into a beautiful symphony. He was an exceptional family man, a very dedicated and highly regarded chartered accountant, and a very proud religious Jew whose profound love of learning Torah, of the land of Israel and of his fellow Jew and human being were integral and vital attributes of his essential being. He endeavoured to achieve a synthesis between the holy and the mundane in an effort to instil holiness into all aspects of his life.

David was a gift to us – our gift from God – a treasure that comes along from time to time in a generation. In David, somehow the best always seemed to get better.

July 14, 2002, David's 49th birthday. The night a violent and raging storm struck our family. David – our navigator – was struck down – stabbed from behind – murdered. In an instant, our lives changed forever.

My children were robbed of their beloved father. It is humanly impossible for words to do justice to the infinite expanse of loss my children have incurred since David's murder. The trauma of our irreversible loss will impact their lives forever.

My mother-in-law, a Holocaust survivor, has had to endure the heart-wrenching task of burying her son. She fights every day to be strong for my children and myself – yet her spirit is broken.

David's brothers, Art and Shloimie, will always mourn David's untimely death. The void in their lives is eternal and the pain in their hearts will never heal.

My mother, David's brothers-in-law, sisters-in-law, nieces and nephews long for David.

My grandchildren and future grandchildren have been cheated out of a beautiful relationship with their loving grandfather.

As for me, Your Honour, a significant part of me died on July 14, 2002. The part of me which coexisted with David, for David and because of David. That night, I lost my best friend, my soulmate, my hero.

David, within the vastness of this world, there is no substitute for the blessed life that was ours. I am perpetually homesick for you and I am perpetually homesick for us.

Murder, a gruesome violation of the respect of man towards his fellow man. Murder disregards the dignity of man and the sanctity of life. Murder shatters the equilibrium of life and robs us of our centre of gravity. In its place, we experience darkness, sorrow, confusion, emptiness, numbness, loneliness, longing, fear, anxiety. And pain, a pain oftentimes so acute and excruciating that it is unbearable.

Murder, the complete disregard for human life.

Murder, the complete disregard for the preciousness and value of human relationships.

David z"l, a man who exhibited the utmost regard, reverence and respect for the sacredness of man, the sacredness of human relationships and the sacredness of God.

Suddenly the life we built together, the life we knew, ended with David's violent death. It was then that we were forced to fight for our survival amidst our grief, sorrow, pain and trauma. Our faith in God, our supportive family and friends, and our belief that David's pure soul accompanies us along our life's journey sustain us.

To my dear children:

As Daddy is our treasure, you are Daddy's treasures. Daddy loved each of you more than life itself, and delighted in your unique personalities. He was always so proud of you and continues to be until this very day. You, my dear children and grandchildren, my treasures, give me reason to live, bring me joy and support and protect me, love me and enable me to see the beauty of Daddy living on within each of you.

Daddy lived, loved and honoured the gift of life with all of its beauty, challenges and complexities.

Our gift to Daddy, is to honour his life by living our lives according to the example Daddy set for us – as a gentle man of clarity, wisdom, strength and conviction.

Your Honour:

My husband David, of blessed memory, lived with enthusiasm and joy. He lived to love and he lived to give. This is the lesson he would have wanted us to take away from our tragedy.

And he would have told us so – with a broad shining smile stretching across his beautiful and gentle face and a twinkle in his eyes that would illuminate this entire courtroom.

David, z"l, we long for you every moment of every day. We ache with the pain of your death and we honour the radiance of your life.

You are our gift forever and we shall love you eternally. May God keep the way straight before us in our lives. Thank you.

עד כאן תמצית העלילה, ועכשיו שאלת השאלות-האם היה שייקספיר אנטישמי, והאם העלאת המחזה כיום היא תמיכה באנטישמיות?

על פניו-שייקספיר תָאַר ללא כחל וסרק את האנטישמיות כפי שהשתקפה בתקופתו. על כך נכתבו חצוות וספרים רבים. אבל הפתרון של שייקספיר-של "הטובים והיפים" מנצחים את שיילוק, גונבים את כספו ומגרשים אותו מן העיר- והסיום האופטימי והעלוי-כל אלה מבטאים לדעתי, ללא כחל וסרק ששייקספיר היה אנטישמי.

אין לי צל של ספק שהקָתָרזיס שעולה מהחצגה של היהודי תָשמָה אנטישמים באשר הם שָם ויכולה לגרום גם למי שלא פגש יהודי מימיו להפוך לשונא יהודים. אכן-גם במחוזות עולם שלא ראו יהודי מימיהם יש אנטישמיות רחבה-לדעתי לא מעט בשל יצידות כאלה.

לא חלפו יומיים מחסכם שארם א שייך ואנשי החמאס חודיעו שלא יקבלו אותו, למרות שימשים קודם לכן אמרו שישתתפו. ולחיזוק דבריהם פתחו בהפגזת מרגמות על שטחים ישראליים. מאז הספיק החמאס לחזור בו ולהבטיח לאבו מאזן שיכבד את הפסקת האש. בישראל מוחיר השב"כ משאננות ומנאיביות, ואנשיו מאמינים שתוך זמן קצר ישתולל הטירור שוב.

Levy takes the reins as Ryerson's new president

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The turning point in Sheldon Levy's life as an academic occurred shortly after he started teaching mathematics and computer science at York University, his alma mater, in 1973.

"The story is that the dean of the faculty of arts was looking for someone to help put his budget on this newfangled apparatus called a computer," explained Levy, who holds an MA degree in mathematics.

"I was interested in technology, so I had a bit of skill to offer. Or maybe I just didn't know enough to be reluctant to try. The rest is history. I kept teaching, but it was soon pretty evident that there would not be enough time to do both."

Thanks to his talents, Levy rose quickly in the ranks as an administrator.

Cutting his teeth as an assistant to the dean, he was given a promotion as a program cost analyst. In 1983, having proven himself as an assistant vice-president in the management information and planning department, he was named an associate vice-president.

Five years later, having given up his duties as a lecturer in calculus, linear algebra and microcomputing, he was appointed vice-president of institutional affairs.

And he has not looked back since.

In 1997, Levy blossomed when he was named president of Sheridan College in Oakville. The University of Toronto hired him as vice-president, in charge of government and institutional relations, in 2001.

Hardly pausing for breath, Levy jumped to the province's newest university – the University of Ontario Institute of Technology in Oshawa – last February as vice-president of finance and strategy.

Earlier this month, he was in the news yet again.

Ryerson University, with an enrolment of 18,000 full-time students, announced that Levy would succeed Claude Lajeunesse as its eighth president on Aug. 1 for a five-year term.

William Davis, Ontario's former premier and his friend, recommended Levy for the job.

"He spoke to me over a year ago about this opportunity. He said that Ryerson is a great place and thought it would be a perfect match. On the day Ryerson announced my appointment, he called to offer his congratulations, and I could hear his big grin over the phone."

Sheldon Levy

Levy, 56, brings three decades' worth of post-secondary experience in both universities and colleges to his latest assignment.

"I think if you asked someone about me, they might say I am pretty good with numbers and not afraid of change," he said.

"So I look for opportunities to dream," he added. "I also try to work with government, my own university or college community and partners in the broadest sense to make things happen."

At the University of Ontario Institute of Technology, which officially opened in September 2003, Levy played a key role.

He developed the funding and financial parameters required for capital operating costs, enrolment, research, student support and so on.

During his tenure at the University of Toronto – Canada's largest university – Levy attempted to nudge it into the ranks of the world's leading public research universities and to facilitate growth in professional and graduate programs.

And then, at Sheridan College, he built student residences, a centre for animation and emerging technologies, a music theatre and an arts centre. As well, he launched a campaign for a student trust find.

At York University, Levy managed a budget of $700 million, oversaw a building program that yielded a sports stadium and a sportsplex, restructured all academic and administrative systems and upgraded its computer infrastructure.

But when asked to enumerate the highlights of his career, Levy said, "My best moments and memories are connected with students, always working with them and helping make their dreams come true."

The challenges facing Levy at Ryerson University are awesome.

He will be expected to expand and enhance undergraduate and graduate programs and research activity, increase community, academic and industry partnerships, build and maintain campus facilities and mould Ryerson into what officials there describe as "a comprehensive university."

Levy intends to listen and learn when he comes on board in the summer. But he already has some ideas.

"Ryerson is growing both in graduate and undergraduate programs and its research presence. At the same time, Ryerson's strength in offering an applied undergraduate curriculum with excellent programs in traditional disciplines is ever more attractive and needed by students.

"Helping Ryerson move forward in all these areas, and continuing the academic and physical development of the campus, is the goal. Success in this will help situate Ryerson among Canada's leading universities."

In general, Levy – the father of two daughters, Sarah and Michelle – brings certain qualities to bear as an administrator.

"If there is one thing I know for sure, it is that leadership means getting to a destination with others, and not going there alone," he observed. "I like to work with people, and find they are always willing to help and have good ideas if you listen. And with that, you have to be prepared to make decisions, and I am not shy about doing that."

Levy's ease with math will be of invaluable assistance to him.

"There is something to be said about a background in mathematics," he noted. "I can usually figure out the numbers associated with a situation, so things like budgets, enrolment targets and strategic planning come pretty easily to me. I also like to take the long view, so that I can see how every step contributes to the objective."

Lajeunesse, who had a hand in hiring him, thinks highly of his successor.

"I have come to know him as a dedicated and talented colleague, committed to furthering the cause of post-secondary education in Ontario. He brings tremendous assets to Ryerson."

Lessons from Canadian clowns in Israel

By SHIRA STANLEIGH
Special to The CJN

So you thought your friends went to Israel for the year to "learn" in yeshiva/seminary? In fact, they spend much of their time just "clowning around."

Guest Voice

Through my involvement in a new program, I have become a staunch supporter of medical clowning. Although I knew the benefits were recognized, I needed to see it for myself to understand how it works as a humane and helpful way of approaching disease.

Kedma is an international student organization that is affiliated with the Orthodox movement. It helps disadvantaged communities in Israel and promotes the concepts of social justice and tikkun olam.

When they initially approached me to coordinate their health projects while I was pursuing a year abroad in Israel from York University, I thought, "Wonderful – blood drives, bone marrow donor recruitment, etc...." – all things that have been recognized by the scientific community as beneficial.

Then my boss approached me about a recently inaugurated initiative – medical clowning.

"You're kidding, right?" I asked. "You expect a bunch of recently graduated 18-year-olds to agree to dress up in brightly mismatched, oversized attire, strap on a clown-nose, smear pink blush on their cheeks, and ultimately believe that they're doing all this to benefit humanity?"

The events of the following few weeks convinced me that it was my initial skepticism that was crazy, not her.

Recruiting students is usually the single greatest challenge of co-ordinating a project for yeshiva students. Their time is limited, and they need special incentives – which is why I was shocked by the number of students banging down my door to sign up for this new initiative. It was like an epidemic of people, all begging to be admitted to this program that would make imposing demands on them both physically and emotionally.

"You don't understand, you have to accept me, this is exactly the kind of thing I've always wanted to do!" they would say. Girls that I remembered from my high school, Ulpanat Orot, who would never be caught dead in mismatched apparel, were suddenly parading before me wearing colors and patterns that were highly contradictory.

I guess even the coolest post-adolescent sometimes yearns to periodically have social permission to be silly. And there was a popular appeal, mostly a derivative of the film Patch Adams.

After some 10 hours of rigorous training and endless visits to clown supply stores, 60 new clowns were ready to hit the wards.

The children's hospital wards in Israel are filled with a varied demographic of the Israeli population. From haredi to Arab children, the spectrum is vast. Despite the differences in personal background, all the kids I saw seemed to have the same response to the clowns – unrestrained joy.

Kids beamed, laughed and begged for more as medical clowns showered them with balloon animals, newspaper origami and juggling tricks. I had nurses coming up to me and asking me where I found these girls.

My response – "Canada, and some from the United States" – was usually met with quizzical looks. "Why come to the wards, though?" was the next logical question.

"Because they feel like they have what to give back," I would answer. And judging by the reaction that the clowns got from the kids, their logic wasn't misguided.

Despite the language barrier, these Canadians and Americans managed to penetrate cultural/linguistic barriers to communicate with each child more expressively then most fluent-in-Hebrew Israelis. I was left with a profound admiration for the pioneers of this movement, like Patch Adams, who dared to see health care outside the conventional medical box.

This basic unification of humanity in a healing endeavour is sorely needed in our homeland, which often, unfortunately, is fraught with fragmentation.

NYC punishes controversial prof

New York City's education department dismissed an anti-Israel professor from a public school course. The department removed Rashid Khalidi, a Columbia University professor of Middle East studies who has been accused of harassing students who hold pro-Israel views, from a professional development course for public school teachers, the New York Sun reported.

Not so funny?

The editors of a Princeton University humor publication will apologize this week for publishing a list titled "Top 10 Holocaust movies I've never seen but would like to." The list, featured in the Feb. 10 Nassau Weekly, was written by two Jewish students, Jacob Savage and Rob Buerki, and placed under the heading "And now for something completely offensive." Savage has said that the pair showed the list to other Jewish students, who were "not offended by it." The decision to apologize came after a disciplinary meeting with the dean of undergraduate students, Savage said. Dylan Tatz, student chairman of the Princeton Committee on Prejudice, is collecting student responses to the article, which he will submit anonymously to Savage and Buerki. "Mocking the genocide of the Holocaust offends universal moral sensibilities," one student wrote.

UJA FEDERATION
Together We're Stronger

'Decision-makers must choose between worthy causes'

Engel opened his remarks by stating that UJA Federation has identified four main community priorities: Jewish education and identity; addressing threats to Israel and Jews around the world; alleviating the impact of poverty at home; and reaching out to the unaffiliated while engaging them in Jewish life.

These issues affect thousands of lives and federation volunteers "are called upon to balance dozens of urgent needs and interests. In the process, they must make wrenching decisions," he said.

Since capital is limited, decision-makers must choose between worthy causes, Engel said.

"A million additional dollars to address one issue means a million fewer dollars for another. It's a hard, difficult responsibility to decide, for example, between funds for Israel and funds for Toronto's poor, funds for education and funds for seniors. Yet, this responsibility is borne with sensitivity and dedication by committed volunteers who are a microcosm of our community."

In addition to providing tuition subsidies and other support for education, the federation must also address other priorities, he said.

"In Toronto and across Canada, many of our sons and daughters on campus face fear and intimidation from faculty and fellow students alike, just for being Jewish.

"Israel is on guard against constant threats of violence and is always fighting international isolation.

"In Israel, the economic gap between rich and poor is widening.

"In Toronto, 20,000 community members live below the poverty line. That's 20,000 too many. The fact that seniors compose a disproportionate percentage of Toronto's Jewish poor is even more disturbing.

"And worst of all, we face the threat of permanently losing thousands of young people to Jewish life," he said.

Anticipating that the discussion period would focus largely on education issues, Engel said "the tuition subsidy program must continue to grow. The current guidelines for tuition subsidies do not reflect new community realities. They do not encourage middle class and mildly affiliated families to enroll their children in the Jewish school system."

Engel suggested improving teaching standards through professional development, providing a Jewish education to children with special needs, ensuring schools are affordable and safe, and lobbying the government to underwrite some of the costs of funding Jewish schools.

He urged the community to work together to present "a unified, common message" to government to "do the right thing" and "participate in funding with our community."

The federation, he said, would welcome "all those willing to work together. We will continue to set the table for our community's collective effort."

Joey Steiner, a former president of UJA Federation, followed Engel's address by noting that the federation conducts extensive consultations before releasing funds for domestic agencies.

"It's a bottom-up process carried out by a large group of volunteers... who are drawn for the most part from community social, cultural agencies, from the schools, who are recipients of the funds raised in the UJA annual campaign and who are the beneficiaries of some capital campaigns and infrastructure campaigns that are underway and continuous."

The volunteers operate within the framework of UJA Federation's strategic plan, which is responsive to the needs of the people served by community agencies, Steiner said.

Money spent outside Canada is "leveraged" in conjunction with other Jewish organizations, such as the Jewish Agency, to magnify its impact, he added.

The volunteers who participate in the allocations process are faced with "gut-wrenching" decisions, he continued. As an example, he pointed to the creation and funding of CIJA, a new community agency that co-ordinates the activities of advocacy groups such as Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee.

Efforts to address rising anti-Semitism, anti-Israel propaganda and media bias has prompted the federation to double allocations to advocacy groups to $10 million annually from $5 million, Steiner said.

"Think how many Israeli children who are victims of the intifadah might have been helped with those funds.

"How many elderly in Toronto could we assist to have a better quality of life with that $5 million?" he asked. "These are tough decisions."

Steiner acknowledged that some may quarrel with the way community funds are distributed, but the decisions are made by a broad group of volunteers who have worked with community agencies and who do the best they can.

Steiner was followed by Baila Lubek, chair of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE). The BJE is a federation agency charged with promoting and enhancing Jewish education.

"Without a doubt, we recognize that Jewish education has to remain a major initiative that has both a strategic and priority-setting [component]," Lubek assured the roundtable.

In the past year, initiatives and programs have been introduced that help schools address issues of governance and fundraising, and ensure that funds are allocated for the benefit of students. The federation works with the schools on setting their priorities and in supporting the professional development of teachers, she said.

Lubek noted that $12 million of the UJA Federation budget has been set aside for education – comprising more than one-third of the organization's domestic allocations.

(UJA Federation's website boasts that its education allocation, out of a total of $51 million projected in the 2005 campaign, is the largest among North American federations.)

Natan Aronshtam, formerly chair of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services' transition committee, concluded the formal part of the roundtable agenda by describing other key federation priorities, including reaching out to the unaffiliated and addressing poverty.

Studies show that 20,000 Jews live below the poverty line, defined in the case of a family of four as $34,000 in annual income. Of the Jewish poor, 3,000 are children. While the 11 per cent poverty rate in the Jewish community is below the 17 per cent for the rest of Toronto, "still, it's totally unacceptable," Aronshtam said.

Most of the poor live near Bathurst Street north of Sheppard Avenue. Many are elderly and immigrants, he said.

Aronshtam, a member of the board of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, said 120,000 Jews in the Toronto area (of an estimated total of 200,000) are considered unaffiliated. "That's a huge number that does not participate in the day-to-day Jewish life of the community."

Immigrants make up a large part of that number and significant effort is being undertaken to accelerate the integration of that group into the organized community, he said.

'Crusading spirit' needed for Jewish education

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community must starting thinking "out of the box," especially when it comes to funding education, said Alan Sandler, a former president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

In a wide-ranging discussion, invitees to the CJN's annual Roundtable on community issues took up Sandler's challenge, putting forward a number of ideas about the future and funding of Jewish education in the city.

Saul Koschitzky, a longtime community leader, suggested that parents could be charged tuition for a maximum of two children, instead of for all their children, if they have more than two children at a time in the system. Also, he said that tuition could be reduced and that parents "not give up on the government. Ontario is the only province in Canada that does not give any money to [the secular portion of Jewish day school] education. It's a long process."

Lorraine Sandler, an early childhood educator and community volunteer, recommended that the community provide parents of newborns with vouchers for at least the first year of early childhood Jewish education. The warmth and nurturing in that type of setting often "opens people's eyes to Jewish belonging, Jewish belief and Jewish practice, and often is the portal to Jewish living," she said.

Donald Carr

She also recommended "building a Jewish education fund" of up to $1 billion, if necessary.

Seymour Epstein, executive director of the federation's Board of Jewish Education, noted that the federation is "following very closely" the research being done in the United States on scholarships and vouchers.

Epstein noted that the BJE has been working with schools in the past few years to help them in the area of "endowment growth for individual schools."

Donald Carr, The CJN's president and a former president of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), reiterated a suggestion he made at last year's round table: that the federation should be looking at revenue from Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (Pardes Shalom Cemetery) as a source of endowment funding for education. "Certainly, in the long range, there are millions of dollars," he said.

Yossi Adler

Syd Eisen, who was founding director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies and is a life member of CHAT's board, recommended that instead of "reallocating scarce funds," the federation should build up an educational endowment fund for tuition for Jewish education.

But in addition to providing funding, he said, a "crusading spirit" is needed to make parents "feel we'll do anything to get the kids in[to Jewish schools]."

Yossi Adler of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS), a grassroots parents' organization, said, however, that he did not get a sense of "crusading spirit" from the federation representatives around the table. Instead, he noted references to "research, planning, setting up committees and developing strategies."

"We have to make [education] a priority, not just say it's a priority."

A similar roundtable discussion was held last year, and "nothing has happened," Adler said.

Federation president Ted Sokolsky agreed that it is "important to light that fire within every member of the Jewish community." But he cautioned that establishing viable foundations to fund education will take time.

Funding for Jewish education is a relatively new "hot item," he said.

Joey Steiner, a former president of UJA Federation, pointed out that there are "lots of fires burning in our community – social services, poverty, an aging Jewish population. We're trying to keep the flames at a tolerable level."

Igor Korenzvit, a member of the CJN's advisory board, noted that allocations are related not only to community needs but also to funds available. "I think it's important for the Jewish community to understand not only the role Federation plays in allocations, but also in fundraising."

He said endowment funds for education may not be the answer. "If we wait until [the funds] grow to the point that the interest will pay for Jewish education, we might find there's no kids or parents who want to send their kids to a Jewish school."

That is especially true among Jewish immigrants, he said. "In 10 years, that community won't exist if we don't get them involved now."

Terri Weintraub, a past president of CHAT, said that people living below the poverty line will get subsidies. "We are missing the middle class. They aren't even applying [to Jewish day schools]."

Korenzvit noted that it's "not only the poor and the rich [who] can send their kids to day school. There's a big group that sends their kids to other private schools."

Government funding isn't a dead issue, said Ira Walfish, OAJDS co-president, adding that attempts are still being made to get the Liberal government to reconsider its rescinding of the tax credit for private school tuition.

Walfish said it is very telling that there is an "extremely low" percentage of students – between 3 and 12 per cent – on subsidy at non-Orthodox day schools. While it could suggest a low level of poverty in the Jewish community, he believes that people are "self-selecting" themselves out of Jewish day school because of tuition fees.

Jerrold Landau

"A lot of people don't want to accept tzedakah to have their kids go to day school. We need strategies to reduce tuition… Many find it a humiliating experience to go in front of a tuition committee."

A "huge number" of tuition receipts are made out to grandparents, said Sokolsky.

And some parents opt for public school not only because it's cheaper, said Epstein, but "there's a very significant part of the community that supports the public school system [because of] ideology."

Also, some parents find there are not only excellent public schools in their neighbourhood, but they have a large "Jewish population," said Sally Zigler, co-chair of the va'ad hachinuch (education committee) at Associated Hebrew Schools, where 42 per cent of students are subsidized.

Among Orthodox Jews, however, Jewish day school is a must, not an option, Epstein noted.

Incomes have not risen anywhere near enough to match the rise in tuition over the past 10 years, Zigler said.

"We can embark on fundraising endeavours, and we're doing that seriously," she said. "We need short-term answers, and we need them now, because our community is depending on that small number of people committed to education, and to this lifestyle, and to producing our future leaders to bring in all those unaffiliated people over the course of the next generation."

Michael Brown, former director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, said it's important to think in broader terms than day school education, citing other examples of Jewish education including adult education and Jewish summer camps.

"As important as the money issue is, I think the question of why people need to be Jewish has to be addressed. They need to know what there is about it all that makes it important… If you make everything cheap and accessible, but not anything wants, then it's all been an exercise in futility."

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah and a member of The CJN's editorial advisory board, noted that education has an impact on many other decisions that children will make in the future, including addressing other needs in the Jewish community.

Saul Koschitzky

Judy Feld Carr, a past president of Beth Tzedec Congregation, suggested that to raise more money, federation should reach out to synagogue lay leaders and bring UJA campaigns into congregations. "The last time Beth Tzedec had a UJA campaign was 1983… Many people in synagogues don't even give $5 to UJA… It is a real loss to this community.

Jerrold Landau of the OAJDS said he's been told education doesn't "sell" a UJA campaign, yet there are hundreds, if not thousands, of day school parents who worry about whether they'll be able to retire, and they feel "let down and left out."

The community has rallied against anti-Semitism, he noted, but "where was the outcry" when Ontario premier Dalton McGuinty repealed the Equity in Education tax credit in November 2003?

Education is "a critical issue, but it's one of a number of issues," said Morris Zbar, a senior vice-president of UJA Federation. "You can't defer feeding 400,000 elderly Jews in the [former] Soviet Union. They have to eat now. We have to be very, very sensitive to the competing priorities. We don't have one mission. We're a communal organization that is required by our mandate and our community to look at all our priorities… I would suggest it's important to let our community know that we do do those things."

Baycrest offers health and wellness information

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

If staying independent means staying informed, then Baycrest is on the way to empowering many of its clients. On top of the medical care it provides, the centre for geriatric care also offers educational programs with the aim of helping seniors live as independently as possible.

"Health and wellness information enables individuals and families to make informed decisions," says Lois Kamenitz, volunteer project manager with the Anne and Louis Pritzker Library. "We really want people to take control of their health care."

Whether through lectures, workshops, courses or conferences, current Baycrest clients, as well as members of the community at large, are welcome to take part in these programs aimed solely at feeding the mind. Below are a few examples of current educational programs.

• The Wellness Library

The Anne and Louis Pritzker Wellness Library officially opened in 2004 and offers information on a variety of health topics, including nutrition and fitness, public health and safety (home safety, preventing falls), pain managements, care-giving, sexuality and disabilities, sleep disorders and mental health. As well, information is available relating to various diseases such as arthritis, Parkinson's and Alzheimer's.

The library currently has more than 400 books, CDs, videos and DVDs, as well as more than 300 pamphlets and brochures. And the list keeps growing.

"At first, we felt like we were cataloguing someone's attic," says Kamenitz. Most of the library's stock came through donations. However, since securing a donor, Kamenitz has been busy ordering new materials and says the ordering will be ongoing.

The library houses a computer with bookmarks for more than 100 consumer health websites, as well as audio/visual equipment and a screening room. It also offers educational sessions, such as a recent lecture on Alzheimer's given by a Baycrest counsellor.

"It's the little library that grew and it's still growing," says Kamenitz.

For more information about the library, call 416-785-2500, ext 3374.

• Aging Well Conference

While some baby boomers may not want to think about getting older, Lesley Miller wants to get the message out that on the contrary, now is the time to get informed. Aging Well Starts Now: A Forum For Baby Boomers and Beyond is a one-day conference offered for the first time through the Wagman Centre at Baycrest. The conference is geared at people from 50 to 70 years old, and will cover such topics as "Laughter is the Jest Medicine" and "Building Relationships and the Importance of Staying Positive."

"There is a lot of information out there for the very elderly and for the young adult, but this in-between demographic sits in the middle of nowhere," says Miller, chair of the conference planning committee. "This groups wants to change the way it ages. The aging, you have no choice. But you do have options for how to make the next 30 or 40 years of your life work."

The conference will feature interactive workshops in small settings. Participants can choose two workshops from the seven offered.

The conference will be held Sunday, April 10 from 8:45 am to 3 pm. For more information and registration, call 416-785-2500, ext 3005, or e-mail startingnow@sympatico.ca

• Memory Intervention Program

For many people, memory loss is a common occurrence with aging. However, some memory loss may be more severe and worrisome, and could be a sign of mild cognitive impairment.

"The difference between people with mild cognitive impairment and those who are just getting older is that their memory is not as good as it should be for someone their age," says Kelly Murphy, a psychologist at Baycrest and the co-ordinator of the Memory Intervention Program.

Murphy explains that people with mild cognitive impairment live independent lives, but may forget simple things, such as an acquaintance's names, where they parked their car or where they have placed their keys.

The Memory Intervention Program, a seven-week course, offers participants information on memory and strategies about how to improve their memories.

"If we can get people to take this program and use their strategies in their day-to-day lives, then in the future they will already have these skills if their memory does decline and they can maintain a level of independence for as long as possible," Murphy says.

People are referred to the course by first meeting with Murphy or another member of her team, and taking a series of tests to determine whether they have mild cognitive impairment. If the tests show that they do, then they are offered a place in the program.

For more information on the program, contact Kelly Murphy at 416-785-2500, ex 3184.

• Computer and Internet Training

As far as Mara Swartz is concerned, it's never too late to learn a new skill. Swartz, the Wagman Centre's recreation co-ordinator, began the centre's first computer training course for seniors five years ago. Then, she had access to only four computers and participants had to share. Now, her program has grown to include 11 computers, one trainer and one volunteer per course, as well as beginner and advanced classes in Internet browsing and word processing.

"The Internet opens a door for them," Swartz says. "It's like opening an encyclopedia they don't have to lift up and carry."

The course teaches about how to navigate the Internet, as well as virus protection and Internet safety. There are eight classes in a session, one hour per week. The computer lab is also open on Tuesdays so that seniors can practise what they've learned in class and get one-on-one help. The classes have no more than eight students per class, and are open to anyone 55 years old and up.

"In therapeutic recreation, we teach so that the person comes alive, lives life and grows to the fullest," says Swartz.

For more information on these and other programs, visit the Baycrest website www.baycrest.org.

Lois Kamenitz, project manager volunteer of Baycrest's new Anne and Louis Pritzker Wellness Library, welcomes everyone in the community to drop by. The library offers a range of books and other information materials about many health topics and caregiving challenges.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My elderly parents have begun using sugar substitutes in place of real sugar in an attempt to cut calories, I am wondering which sugar substitutes are best and safest?

A. I like to recommend Splenda. It is made from sucrose (regular sugar) and has proven to be safe in the testing done to date. It is also easy to use for baking or cooking.

Q. I just found out that I am allergic to milk, and I would like to know if I now need to take a calcium supplement since I have had to cut out all dairy products.

A. If you like and can tolerate soy milk, many of the soy milks are fortified with calcium and can deliver your daily required dose. Also, salmon, almonds and broccoli contain calcium. If you do not consume soy products that have added calcium, then talk to your doctor or a dietitian about a calcium supplement. Make sure to read soy milk containers carefully because many do not contain calcium. The refrigerated varieties generally have the most calcium content.

Q. I have read a lot about the PCB contamination in salmon and I am concerned, but my family loves it. Is there a good way to prepare it?

A. There are a few things that you can do to reduce your intake of these contaminants and still enjoy salmon. You can buy wild salmon or salmon trout. When cooking any type of salmon, it is best to use a method that allows fat to drip off – like barbecuing or broiling. Once the salmon is cooked, remove the skin, any whitish liquid and the grey part between the meat and skin. Canned salmon is a good choice because it is usually wild salmon today.

Q. My five-year-old daughter has a good friend with a severe peanut allergy. She often plays at our house, and we do eat peanut butter. What steps I should take to ensure her safety when she is over for a playdate?

A. First, make sure no one is eating peanut butter while she is there, to avoid the risk of cross contamination in the kitchen – contamination from hands and airborne aromas. Make sure that you do not have bowls of nuts out, and always make sure those who eat peanut butter wash their hands after eating to avoid getting even a trace on toys, furniture, etc.

Ask the friend's mother to let you know what snacks are safe for her to eat or ask the child to bring one with her when she comes. Make sure the mother leaves a number to reach the parents, as well as the girl's EpiPen (life-saving epinephrine injection). And learn how to use it. Finally, double-check with the parents to make sure that the little girl is not allergic to anything else. I applaud you for taking smart steps to welcome this friend into your home.

World expects Sharon to be Gorbachev

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

Ariel Sharon's government made history on Sunday with its decision on the evacuation of the settlements from the Gaza Strip and northern West Bank. The dry, brief evacuation orders issued after the cabinet meeting and bearing the signatures of Sharon and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz herald the beginning of the end of the Israeli settlement enterprise in the territories.

The decision on the security fence route approved by the cabinet marks the change in Israel's goals vis-à-vis the Palestinians – from one of guarding every centimetre of Judea and Samaria, to a battle to save the Gush Etzion bloc of settlements and to annex Ma'aleh Adumim, Ariel and Efrat.

The prime minister enjoys more international support than ever before. Jordan and Egypt are sending their ambassadors back without waiting for the settlers to be evacuated; and U.S. and European statesmen are enthusiastically applauding Sharon's courage. The man who once symbolized only war and destruction has suddenly become the symbol of hope in the region.

But this support will last, at best, until the gate closes on the last of the settlers to be evacuated. The world expects Sharon to be a Mikhail Gorbachev – the former Soviet leader who made the crack in the dam, which was followed by a flood.

Gorbachev didn't plan on dismantling the Soviet Union, but merely to somewhat loosen the shackles of the Communist regime so that he could survive a little better. But the moment he allowed freedom to trickle in, no one could stop it, and the regime was buried beneath it.

In Washington, in Paris, in London, as well as in Ramallah, Cairo and Amman, the same fate is being wished for Sharon – that the next withdrawal from the West Bank is even quicker and deeper; that with Mahmoud Abbas as president of the Palestinian Authority, and with security calm, Israel will lose its remaining arguments and excuses and will be forced to pull out of Ofra, Beit El and Hebron, and then Beit Hanina, Sheikh Jarrah and most of the Old City in Jerusalem, too.

Sharon, however, has no intentions of adopting the 1967 lines.

In Israel, we are still debating the disengagement, the level of violence of the pullout opponents and a referendum. In the international arena, the withdrawal from Gaza looks like a done deal, and the political debate is already centring on the next stage – a final-status agreement or an interim arrangement.

Sharon wants to proceed cautiously toward an interim agreement in the West Bank; Abbas wants to race to a final settlement. Abbas enjoys widespread support in Europe and has supporters in the U.S. administration as well. The White House, though, supports Sharon and is sticking to the "road map" peace plan's interim settlement.

Sharon has five weeks to get the budget approved, and thereafter, in early April, he will go to Washington, where he will likely receive a warm reception. The ministry of finance is already working on the aid package that Sharon will request from President George W. Bush.

the pullout is "a very, very difficult move – difficult for the residents of the settlements, difficult for the citizens of Israel, difficult for me, and I am sure, difficult for the ministers of this government. But it is vital for the future of the State of Israel."

Sunday night, after the cabinet vote, the prime minister returned to the same theme in a speech to a Jerusalem gathering of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, calling it the most difficult decision he has made in his 60-year career in public service, whether in the army or in politics.

"Israel has taken a step that will be decisive for its future… the right one to ensure Israel's future as a Jewish and democratic state," he said.

Sharon noted that "in the broadest sense, the disengagement plan… fortifies our security, strengthens our economy, improves our international stature and advances the chances for peace in our region. It was a very, very difficult decision, but it is a decision of hope for the citizens of Israel, a hope for a better future for us all."

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz told the cabinet the most important thing about the plan is that there should not be any interruptions between each of the four separate withdrawal stages that it stipulates. He mentioned the possibility of conducting two groups of settlement evacuations simultaneously.

Sunday, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas told the press the Palestinian Authority (PA) would ensure that the Gaza withdrawal takes place without any violence on the Palestinian side – which is of major concern to the defence establishment. The Palestinians, Abbas said, would "throw flowers on the Israelis, not stones."

> 'It was a very, very difficult decision'

In supporting the decision, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said, "I never believed I would see the day that I would raise my hand in favour of such a decision, but after difficult deliberation, I decided to vote in favour."

Among the ministers who voted against the disengagement were Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and minister without portfolio Natan Sharansky.

Sharansky refused to support the legislation, saying the Palestinians had to democratize more. Then he mentioned what he termed "the hatred and delegitimization" of the settlers. "It is frightening to see how an entire public of law-abiding citizens who oppose the disengagement are being delegitimized."

He asked all Israelis "not to lend a hand to the character assassination of people who devoted their lives to the fulfilment of Zionism.

"It is clear to all that the disengagement is the first step on the road map," Sharansky said.

Sharon replied that "there will be no automatic start on our part of the road map. We will only go on to the road map when the PA does all it has committed to do, like stopping the incitement, dismantling the terror organizations, conducting reforms and ceasing the violence."

New Zealand rejects Israeli apology on alleged Mossad agents

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WELLINGTON, New Zealand — Wellington has rejected an official Israeli apology on the matter of two alleged Mossad agents who were apprehended and jailed after they tried to fraudulently obtain a New Zealand passport.

New Zealand's Prime Minister Helen Clark said that Israel conveyed its apology via Wellington's ambassador to Turkey, but said the tone of the apology was feeble and unacceptable. Israel is seeking to end the diplomatic crisis in order to accommodate a visit to New Zealand by President Moshe Katsav, as part of his trip to Australia next month.

Elisha Kara and Uriel Kalman were arrested in New Zealand in March 2004. The two were tried, convicted and sentenced to six months in jail and fined $50,000 (NZ). They were released three months later, and deported to Israel.

Government sources in Wellington said that Israel's apology consisted of nothing but a general expression of sorrow. The sources stressed that Israel's apology did not meet New Zealand's demands that Israel must clarify what the alleged agents were planning to do with the passport, to reveal whether passports were obtained fraudulently in the past, and to commit that such activities will not be repeated.

Clark appeared in a press conference alongside Australian Prime Minister John Howard. Howard tried to downplay a recent incident in which an Israeli diplomat was expatriated after the Australian media reported he maintained a relationship with a female employee of Australia's Defence Department. Howard stressed the two incidents in New Zealand and Australia were not related.

Canadian nearly upstages 'governator' at March of Living gala

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It must be pretty difficult to upstage "the governator," particularly on his home turf, but Rwanda native Juliet Karugahe came pretty close to doing that recently.

Speaking at a March of the Living (MOL) gala dinner in Los Angeles honouring California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, Karugahe delivered a moving and eloquent address recounting her participation in the 2001 trip to Poland.

Her visit to Auschwitz gave her the opportunity to meet survivors of the Holocaust, among them Sylvia Guttman, whose parents were gassed in the death camp, she said.

"I was moved by her courage and bravery in sharing her story with us and in educating others about the Holocaust," Karugahe stated.

As the audience of 800 listened in rapt attention, Karugahe linked the two genocides and paid tribute to family members who were killed in Rwanda in 1994, when as many as one million Tutsis and Hutu moderates were killed by Hutu extremists.

"When a survivor of the Holocaust holds hands with a Rwandan student in Auschwitz, and when they dry each other's tears and learn from one another, we know that Hitler and tyrants like him can be defeated," she said.

Karugahe's address was one of the highlights in a star-studded evening at the Los Angeles-Beverley Hilton. CNN personality Larry King hosted the event, which was attended by Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Israeli tourism minister Avraham Hirchson, the founding president of MOL.

In addition to Karugahe, the evening's Canadian content was extensive, said Eli Rubenstein, national director of MOL Canada.

Toronto native Tara Strong, who participated in the 1990 March of the Living, sang the American and Israeli national anthems, as well as Lay Down Your Arms, a song of peace written by an Israeli veteran of the Yom Kippur War.

Schwarzenegger delivers keynote address

Canadian input also came in the form of an MOL video produced in Toronto that featured footage and interviews with Canadian MOL participants, and an MOL CD presented to the audience featured music sung by Canadian MOL participants, Rubenstein said.

The evening raised close to $1 million (US), which will subsidize international participants in this May's MOL, which will mark the 60th anniversary of the defeat of Nazi Germany.

While MOL is generally aimed at Jewish high school students, the 2005 event is expected to attract Jewish and gentile university-aged students, as well as educators, survivors and numerous dignitaries – up to as 18,000 people in all, including 1,000 Canadians, Rubenstein said. Canada usually sends 400 youths to the MOL.

Karugahe, a student at the University of Toronto, said that when she speaks about the Rwandan genocide and the Holocaust, she highlight the "universal" dimension of the events.

After her talk in Los Angeles, survivors approached her "and they were glad that I made the connection," she said.

Karugahe, who lost 28 members of her family in the Rwanda genocide, said her maternal aunt lost a son and a daughter at the time. The boy was stoned to death, while the 16-year-old daughter was shot in her mother's arms. "They made her sit in her mother's lap and shot her. She [her aunt] actually thinks in a weird way that her daughter died in a better way than her son."

The murderer, a Roman Catholic priest, is alive and well and living in the south of France, Karugahe stated.

When it was pointed out to Karugahe that Nazi war criminals also avoided justice after their crimes, she said the Hutu killers "called it the final solution to the Tutsi problem, as if the Nazis created the first guide to exterminate" an entire people.

In her Los Angeles address, Karugahe noted that her aunt's experience was not unique.

"Many Tutsi parents, fully aware of the imminent death of their children by crude instruments [farm tools, sticks and stones] actually paid money to the murderous Hutu extremists to have their children shot rather than hacked to death. Again, the international community stood by."

In the aftermath of the Holocaust, the international community vowed, "Never again," she said. "Sadly this is not a promise that has been kept… I firmly believe the Rwandan regime at the time realized the international community would not be willing to act. This culture of impunity allows small groups of extremists to brutalize people with no fear of consequences, as is happening today to the people of Darfur in Sudan."

In the evening's keynote address, Schwarzenegger recounted his own Holocaust education. His father, he said, "fought on various fronts, but he never mentioned the war to me." (Schwarzenegger's father, an Austrian, served in the German army during World War II.)

His mother, on the other hand, worked as a secretary after Austria was absorbed by Germany in the Anschluss. Once on the way to work, "she was stunned by what she saw. Along the side of the road, she saw the bodies of people who had been shot to death."

She told her superior at work and he said, "'If you make one more complaint, I cannot guarantee your safety,'" Schwarzenegger recounted.

"What she saw that morning was only a tiny sliver of a much larger, darker truth."

Referring to Michelle Kleinert, his deputy director of community affairs, Schwarzenegger noted she met Holocaust survivor Sigi Hart on a 1996 MOL in Poland.

Schwarzenegger paid tribute to Hart's grace and kindness, even after experiencing the horrors of the death camps.

"We can ask how the inhumanity of Auschwitz could happen. But we can also ask, how is it that the evil of Auschwitz could not destroy the goodness of a man like Sigi Hart? How is it he was able to fall in love with another survivor and together build a close, happy family of their own… It is like after a terrible fire when a seedling sprouts up and in defiance and hope begins to renew the forest. That is what survivors have done."

Compensation Bill passed

The Knesset approved the Gaza evacuation compensation bill, the key legislation underlying Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan and one of the most controversial laws in the nation's history. The bill passed 59 to 40 with five abstentions.

House razing policy ends

Israel has halted its policy of demolishing the homes of Palestinian terrorists. Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz ordered the halt on the recommendation of an internal review. According to Ha'aretz, the Defence Ministry panel determined that the demolitions' deterrent effect was offset by the hostility the destruction bred among Palestinians, which could perpetuate more violence.

Dubai man eyes Gaza settlements

An Arab billionaire reportedly offered to buy Israeli settlements in the Gaza Strip. Mohamed Ali Al-Abbar, chairman of the Dubai-based real-estate conglomerate Emaar, offered Israel $56 million (US) for the Gush Katif settlement bloc, which is to be evacuated this summer. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has said the Gaza settlements will be razed after the withdrawal, but according to Ha'aretz, Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres has urged Sharon to consider Abbar's proposal.

A-G recommends charges against Omri Sharon

Israel's top legal adviser exonerated Ariel Sharon in a fundraising case, but he ordered criminal charges against the prime minister's son. Attorney General Menachem Mazuz said there is enough evidence to indict MK Omri Sharon for fraud, breach of trust and perjury for his alleged role in arranging foreign funding for Sharon's campaign to head the Likud Party in 1999. For Omri Sharon to be indicted, the Knesset would have to remove his parliamentary immunity. He faces seven years in jail if convicted.

Chief of staff to be replaced

Israel's army chief, who has occasionally criticized government policy, lost a bid to serve for another year. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz announced that Lt. Gen. Moshe Ya'alon's three-year tenure will not be extended when it ends July 9. Critics noted that the decision means Israel will be replacing the leaders of both the army and the Shin Bet intelligence service on the eve of the planned withdrawal from Gaza.

Threat to desecrate grave

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told a Likud faction meeting last week that his family has hired security guards to protect the grave of his late wife, Lily, from possible desecration by extremists opposed to his policies who apparently threatened to dig up her body.

Rabbi promotes genetic link between kohanim

By ELI STUTZ
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Does modern genetic research support the belief that all Jews share a common ancestry?

The answer is yes, according to Rabbi Yaakov Kleiman, director of the Center for Kohanim in Jerusalem's Old City.

According to Jewish tradition, Jacob was the progenitor of the Children of Israel, known later as the Jewish People. Today, after a long period of exile, Jews live on five continents and have taken on the outward appearance of their host nations.

"So," asks Rabbi Kleiman, "if a Moroccan Jew looks nothing like his Polish counterpart, who's to say they're related?"

The answer to this question begins in a Toronto synagogue, where Dr. Karl Skorecki, a nephrologist at the University of Toronto and a kohen (a member of the Jewish priestly class), observed another kohen of Sephardic background being called to the Torah.

Skorecki, a Jew of European descent, considered his own fair complexion, light hair and eye colour, compared with the dark skin, hair and eyes of his fellow kohen. He then recalled the Torah passage that states that all kohanim are descendants of Aaron the high priest.

Perplexed, he decided to investigate whether, despite outward differences, kohanim have a common genetic background. Skorecki conducted a study along with Dr. Michael Hammer of the University of Arizona. Together, they sampled a group of self-identified kohanim (priests), and analyzed their Y-chromosomes.

Their hypothesis was that since kehuna (priesthood) is patrilineal, the Y-chromosome of kohamin might contain a common "marker" (genetic sequence).

Indeed, this marker was found. The study showed that both Ashkenazic and Sepharadic kohanim have a very high percentage of one particular marker: YAP-. This marker, along with another group of markers found in follow-up studies, have come to be known as the "cohen modal haplotype" (CMH) – the standard genetic signature of the Jewish priestly family.

The results of this study intrigued Rabbi Kleiman, himself a kohen and the co-director of the Center for Kohanim, which was established to promote identity and knowledge among kohanim and increase commitment to their heritage.

Now, the belief that all kohanim have common genes was supported by cutting-edge scientific research.

"But it goes even further," says Rabbi Kleiman. "Subsequent studies that track the rate of mutations on the Y-chromosome indicated that CMH started approximately 106 generations ago. This takes us back to the end of the Egyptian exile – right around the birth of Aaron the cohen."

Rabbi Kleiman was so impressed by the research findings that he followed the growing trail of genetic research further back, to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, searching for a genetic pattern common to all Jews.

"This too, has now been found," he says. "According to the latest findings, all Diaspora Jewish communities share the "cohen modal haplotype," but in lower percentages than are found in Kohanim.

"This is because 'kohen' is a genetic definition based on father-to-son inheritance. But 'Jewish' is more universal, since Judaism accepts converts."

Rabbi Kleiman notes that further research indicates that all Jews, no matter where they live today, exhibit the genetic markers shared by other people native to the Middle East region – an indication that today's Jews originated from the ancient Hebrews in this region.

What do these findings signify for kohanim and Jews?

"It's a sanctification of God's name," Rabbi Kleiman says. "It strengthens the faith of those who believe with cold hard science. It's an indication that the line of tradition has never been lost. Ultimately, the Torah promises that just as we will be scattered to the ends of the earth, so too, we will be gathered together at the end of days. Now we can track this promise in the genetic code itself."

Kleiman is now investigating communities in the Diaspora who claim a connection to the Jewish people.

"Some of the findings are quite positive. The Cochin Jews of India have been found to have the genetic markers of the ancient Hebrews, indicating a very low rate of intermarriage over the centuries. Ethiopian Jews, though, show markers more similar to their North African neighbours. But there's an African tribe called the Lemba, who claim to come from the ancient Hebrews, and they do have such a genetic connection."

"Genetics is no replacement for tradition," Rabbi Kleiman says. "But if someone is interested in being tested for 'Jewish-ness' or 'kohen-ness,' he's welcome to contact the Center for Kohanim and we'll do our best to help."

Rabbi Kleiman has published a book with his findings, DNA and Tradition.

How Canada reads Leonard Cohen

Beautiful Losers* by Leonard Cohen, McLelland and Stewart, 1966.

By NORMAN RAVVIN

This year's CBC-sponsored program, Canada Reads, which asks panelists to choose the year's definitive novel, includes among its candidates Leonard Cohen's 1966 novel Beautiful Losers. It's easy to be cynical about programs invoking a uniform country-wide taste, but in an era of ever-increasing monopolization of Canadian bookselling and publishing, there is no gain in griping about efforts that sell books and raise our literature's profile.

Norman Ravvin

The inclusion of Cohen's novel seems, on the surface, a natural: he is, of late, feted as a cultural icon – a suave, soulful granddad – and Beautiful Losers is unmistakably among our most influential novels. But when viewed within the Canada Reads mandate to promote books that are representative of the country's culture, the choice raises surprising questions about how Cohen has been read.

There is no way to guess how certain works are deemed definitive, or essential, by a program like Canada Reads. This year's list of five novels aims for some regional balance (at least in central Canadian terms); cultural balance (though there are three Quebec novels); as well as the promise of spiritual uplift (that is, if you like your moralism bitter, à la Margaret Atwood).

Beautiful Losers is one of those books, along with W.S. Burroughs' Naked Lunch and Umberto Eco's Foucault's Pendulum, which may sit on people's shelves unread. It has, since its appearance, garnered a youth audience, and it is, despite its provocative form and language, a book that welcomes a wide array of readers.

Set in pre-Expo Montreal, it mines the cultural moment with ironic savvy. Quebec nationalism, bohemian sexuality and drug use, popular music, the prospect of a parliamentary career, and homosexual love are a few of its themes. With many of its key scenes set on Montreal's St. Lawrence Boulevard, the novel flirts with the idea of becoming an investigation of what Cohen calls the "New Jew." But the status of the Jew in postwar Montreal is overwhelmed by Cohen's central concern, which is the crossing points shared by Montreal's Jesuit past and its Mohawk heritage. The figure who exemplifies this is Kateri Tekakwitha, a Mohawk woman who figures in the early Jesuit reports regarding the "praying village," Kahnawake, on the south shore of the St. Lawrence.

Cohen takes on these concerns without a trace of political correctness, displaying, in all their thorniness and provocation, the founding stories that different communities attach to the city. And his characters' search after Montreal's past is overwritten by their pursuit of extreme experience, from sexual to religious to political ecstasy. As with much of Cohen's best work, Beautiful Losers succeeds at linking high culture concerns with pop cultural fun. His narrator is an aficionado of late-night radio, while his best friend is prone to hopped-up Nietzschean rants. When the narrator stumbles into a nationalist demonstration in "Parc Lafontaine Park," the moment when he is singled out as a Jew is played as much for laughs – the kind Lenny Bruce might provoke – as for political commentary.

Cohen is so coy, or vague, or subtle about the role of Jewishness in his proto-multicultural novel, that one important Canadian critic has even argued that the book's narrator is not Jewish.

The beauty of Cohen's novel resides partly in the fact that as he cuts through his swath of grand themes, he maintains his humour, his lyrical irony, and a sense of distance from his characters. The best example of this is a scene, much avoided by critics and reviewers, where his central characters are portrayed as suckers for fascism, a part of the "Hitler wave" that some historians saw arriving in the late 1960s, when Nazism was no longer the taboo subject it had been in the immediate postwar years. There are a number of such scenes in the novel – like hidden Alice-in-Wonderland doors – which, when opened, suggest the writer's views on Jewishness, circa 1965.

The Canadian first edition of Beautiful Losers, with drawings by Harold Town.

Cohen, a son of Montreal's manufacturing elite, portrays his narrator as he explores an abandoned clothing factory: "We walked between the rows of sewing machines, cutting tables, defunct steam pressers… among the grotesque shadows cast by the abandoned machines." These are the ghosts of Montreal's Jewish past, and Cohen's own ancestral past – the life he walked away from when he marched into the arms of Greenwich Village bohemia.

The conclusion of Beautiful Losers is among the strangest in Canadian literature, and it is here that Cohen shpritzes us, as Lenny Bruce might have done from a night-club stage, about the "New Jew." Who is this figure? He has "induced amnesia by a repetitious study of history… Sometimes he is Jewish but always he is American, and now and then, Québécois." Cohen has more to say on the matter, as did his compatriot Mordecai Richler in his 1955 novel Son of a Smaller Hero. Where Richler was fascinated with what postwar Jews were making of themselves, Cohen is only intermittently interested. Still, his novel has been read without any sustained attention to these themes.

If Beautiful Losers is dubbed the novel to read in 2005, keep an eye out to see if these hidden byways of Cohen's book receive an airing.

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is Lola by Night. He is co-editor of The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader and chairs the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

King David The Musical premieres at the Winter Garden

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

An expanded version of Eyal Bitton's hit stage musical about King David will have its premiere in Toronto.

Bitton's original version of David drew large crowds and received enthusiastic reviews in Montreal for productions at Saidye Bronfman Centre and at Oscar Peterson Concert Hall.

King David The Musical, a fundraiser for Beth Tikvah Synagogue, will be staged at the Winter Garden Theatre at 8:00 p.m. on March 7, for one night only.

"I explore what David's rise to fame was all about," says Bitton, a former Montrealer who is now the choir director at Beth Tikvah. "Why do we love this man when he has so many moral failings?"

He adds that he was always fascinated with the biblical story of King David. "It is because King David demonstrated how we can err and still find our way."

The larger and more ambitious production at the Winter Garden Theatre features Bitton's actor/singer wife Michele Tredger as Bathsheba and Jason Allen as King David. Both actors appeared in the Montréal productions of the show.

"Jason Allen is a phenomenal performer – extremely intense and passionate," Bitton says.

Tredger and Allen were in the cast of Second City's Tony 'n' Tina's Wedding. Tredger has appeared on the television show The Eleventh Hour and CTV's Holocaust docudrama Undying Love.

"The cast is extremely talented," Bitton says. "They're all triple-threats – they can act, sing and dance extremely well. It's a thrill to work with people of that calibre."

King David The Musical takes us to the world of an unappreciated and humble youth who dreams of fame. It opens with the sound of crashing cymbals and drums as the Israelite armies prepare to meet the Philistines.

After the defeat of Goliath, David wins the hearts of the public and Princess Michal, King Saul's daughter, whom he marries.

When Saul is killed in battle, David becomes king. The musical explores the affection David has for the radiant Bathsheba and his attempts to avoid scandal.

Bitton, 35, was born in Montreal; his family left there for French-speaking Kinshasa, Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo) when he was a year old. When Bitton was eight, the family returned to Montreal, where he attended day school.

He studied pure and applied sciences in college and found that he had no passion for them. Then he switched to Jewish studies at McGill University and began writing music. He eventually became the conductor at Montreal's Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue. "Music and poetry became the most important to me," Bitton says.

For Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary, he wrote an oratorio, Rights of Passage: The Journey to Jerusalem. Bitton was the co-lyricist for The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, which played at Montreal's Yiddish Theatre. He also wrote and mounted Freedom: The Moses and Martin Luther King Jr. Tribute. He draws a parallel between African-Americans and the ancient Hebrews in Freedom.

Tickets for King David The Musical are $72, $54 and $36. To order, call 416-221-3433, ext. 352.

PORGY AND BESS IN TOWN FOR ONE WEEK ONLY

Recognized as an American masterpiece, Porgy and Bess stunned music and drama critics alike at its 1935 premiere.

Seventy years later, a New York production of the magnificent opera is coming to Toronto for one week after having already played in more than 500 cities on six continents since 1992. The Lively Arts production features an outstanding 26-member cast and 20-piece orchestra.

The opera is based on Porgy, a 1925 novel by DuBose Heyward that might otherwise have been forgotten. Feted in its day, the book drew much interest from composers like Jerome Kern and Oscar Hammerstein, and even Al Jolson wanted to produce a musical. Only after these various discussions failed was George Gershwin given the green light.

Thus was born an unforgettable jazz- and blues-infused score that includes such classic tunes as Summertime, I Got Plenty O' Nuttin', It Ain't Necessarily So, A Woman Is A Sometime Thing and others performed with enthralling choruses. Ira Gershwin wrote the lyrics.

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 18. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office. E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Please note: submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2005 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, March 4, 2005. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 11, 2005.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 24, 2005. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Comedienne keeps her comedy kosher

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Take a dollop of Jackie Mason, a dash of Jerry Seinfeld and a healthy serving of Lucille Ball's wackiness and you have the recipe for the comedic stylings of Ayelet, an up-and-coming Jewish comic.

Ayelet

Like Cher and Madonna, she only goes by one name professionally. (Her last name is Ben Har.) But unlike those other entertainers, the 20something comic is completely family friendly – she doesn't swear, tell dirty jokes or talk about sex – and, as a strictly observant Jew, she only performs in front of women.

Known as the "Kosher Komic," she touts herself as the only "strictly kosher" comedienne in the world.

"Most comics today are not in any way clean. Jewish humour, kosher humour, is difficult, but somehow Hashem has helped me find the way to be funny and clean," says Ayelet, who lives in Jerusalem's Old City.

Her latest world tour runs from February to April and hits London, Toronto and the east and west coasts of the United States. She is scheduled to perform at the BAYT synagogue in Thornhill on Sunday, March 6, at 8 p.m.

Her set includes routines about children, Pesach, diets and quirky occasions in Jewish life. She also pokes fun at Britney Spears' newfound kashrut observance and kvetches about her misadventures with shadchanim (matchmakers) – "I've contacted 165 shadchanim in nine different states, four different countries and personally seen over 75 of them, all in nine months."

But she is perhaps best known among her fans for her tongue-in-cheek shtick called "Glatt Kosher Airlines."

"All of our flights are numbered 613... Gentlemen, I hope you can hear me through the mechitzah. My voice has been altered for your protection... Should there be, chas v'chalila, a rapid change in cabin pressure, from the panel above your head will fall a Sefer Tehillim [Psalms]. Please say your own tehillim first, prior to assisting a small child, elderly passenger or recent baal tshuvah seated next to you."

Ayelet wasn't always what she calls the "ultra-Orthodox girl with bulletproof stockings."

She's been a performer for about 10 years, having bounced between New York and Los Angeles as an actress and appeared on HBO, Comedy Central and Lifetime Television, as well as on Sesame Street and The Division.

She began doing stand-up five years ago in "treif" comedy clubs across New York and Los Angeles – including such well-known comedy institutions as The Improv, Laugh Factory and the Comedy Store – before becoming observant 2½ years ago.

She only revived her career in its new, more conservative form last year while performing in front of seminary girls in Jerusalem. She has since entertained haredi women, as well as more modern crowds – she appeared last month at a café in Jerusalem's Baka neighbourhood, followed by a performance the following night in a private living room in the haredi Jerusalem neighbourhood of Har Nof.

"People have always told me I am very funny. I just took a while to get my courage together and get up on stage to make people laugh. But once I was up there, there was no getting me down."

Ayelet currently works for two Jewish outreach organizations, Aish HaTorah and Isralight, where she first "found the beauty and truth in Torah, and a terrific, meaningful life."

Ayelet has performed at seminaries, in living rooms and at shul fundraisers – but only for women.

"I have been in showbiz in the secular world. I've performed in front of mixed crowds, men and women. I've come to a point in my life where I feel that it would be most modest of me to perform only in front of women," she says.

In doing so, Ayelet has given many observant Jewish women their first opportunity to see stand-up comedy.

Many observant Jews don't have televisions and don't go to movies, mostly due to sexual and violent content, thereby limiting their entertainment choices, she explains.

Ayelet says she looks up to Rachel Factor, an Orthodox Jewish convert and former Rockette who is touring with a one-woman show called JAP.

"She is an amazing Jewish woman and a terrific performer," Ayelet says. "She has transformed her whole life and is now doing what she loves and making Jewish women happy."

Ayelet's CD is available at select locations, or at www.kosherkomedy.com.

Tickets for her BAYT show are $10 if bought before Feb. 28 and $15 at the door. To reserve, call 905-886-3810, ext. 127.

Classic play has a modern twist

By SHERI SHEFA
Special to The CJN

The Gondoliers is a play that promises to take its audience on a musical and comedic journey from the romantic canals of Venice to the brightly lit and gaudy Las Vegas strip.

The North Toronto Players, a community music-theatre group, with the support of the Toronto Arts Council, are putting on the classic William S. Gilbert and Arthur Sullivan opera, but with a contemporary twist.

In the Gilbert and Sullivan version of the Gondoliers, which was written more than 100 years ago and was set in 18th century Venice, one of the characters has reason to believe he may be the heir to a mythical kingdom.

But the stage director, Michael Harms – who doubles as an actor by filling the role of Luiz – and the music director, John Ricciardelli, massaged the classic script to give it a modern feel.

"It's quite a complicated story," Harms says.

The play is set in 1977, the year the King of Rock and Roll died. Marco and Giuseppe, two Venetian gondoliers, played by Lou D'Amore and Jay Stephenson, are told that either one of them could be the heir to his proverbial throne. They decide to leave their new brides in Venice for Las Vegas in an attempt to become rock stars.

Harms says that many of the ideas that Gilbert and Sullivan tried to portray in the 19th century still apply today.

"Gilbert liked to poke fun at the notion of royalty and the whole upper class. In his play, here is a child raised by gondoliers going to be the king of a country. The same sort of thing goes on today with celebrities," he says.

For instance, in Harms' play, the idea that a gondolier could become an instant rock star simply because he might be the heir to another rock star reflects the notion that celebrities are treated like royalty.

"We've spent a lot of time writing and re-writing it," Ricciardelli says. "What we've done is modernize it, put it in a modern setting in Las Vegas. Musically, we've thrown in bits and pieces of contemporary disco and rock music to brighten in up."

While he and Harms re-wrote the script, changed the dialogue, and added references to 1970s music and some 1950s rock and roll to the musical score, he says they were still able to retain much of the play's original humour.

Ricciardelli says the wardrobe itself, which he describes as "interesting costumes surrounded by a disco theme," also adds to the play's comedic element.

"Gilbert's jokes still work, but we put a contemporary twist on it," says Harms, who has been directing plays for the North Toronto Players for 11 years. "We try all the way through to stay true to Gilbert and Sullivan's vision."

The play features two large choruses of men and women of all ages who love to participate in community theatre, says Ricciardelli, who plays the piano and is conductor of the 16-piece orchestra.

Although the cast is amateur in the sense that they don't sing and act for a living, they are very accomplished and dedicated, having practiced every week for the past several months, he says.

"Some of the actors sang with the Canadian Opera Company. They are mostly students, but are very talented," he says.

There will be six performances from February 25-27, and March 4-6 at the Leah Posluns Theatre in Toronto, near Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue. For more information, visit www.northtorontoplayers.com.

Argos' doctor plays key role in soldiers' rehab centre

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A Toronto doctor who is the physician for the Toronto Argonauts was instrumental in establishing a rehabilitation centre for injured soldiers in Israel.

The rehab centre, at the Chaim Sheba Medical Center at Tel-Hashomer, was the brainchild of Anthony (Tony) Galea, a specialist in sports medicine.

Galea, who has served as a physician at the Olympic Games in Nagano, Japan, and in Sydney, visited Israel for the first time in May 2001. In December, on his second visit, he toured several rehab facilities with Sharon Bialkovich, a lawyer who was an intelligence officer in the Israel Defence Forces.

At the facilities, Galea saw badly injured elite soldiers receiving rehabilitation beside elderly stroke patients. "My background being sports medicine, dealing with Olympic and professional athletes, I thought the young soldiers should have a special centre for rehab as we have for athletes in Canada," he says.

He told Bialkovich that something should be done and his friend said, "So do something about it." Galea did.

One of Galea's first steps toward establishing a rehab centre was to meet with the chief of orthopedics at Sheba's rehabilitation centre.

In the spring of 2002, Galea suggested Sheba develop sports medicine protocols and testing procedures for its rehabilitation system. He raised $100,000 for the undertaking.

"The first project was to develop objective… tools that can monitor rehabilitation progression and improvement," he says.

He knew there was a branch of the Sheba Hospital in New York City, but through his fundraising activities, he discovered there was an inactive chapter of Sheba in Toronto.

"The hospital asked me to revitalize the Toronto branch," he says. He formed a revitalized Toronto board that includes Wendy Melvin, Evan Green, Helen and Mendel Green, David Cynamon and Barry Rottenberg.

In the process, Galea had a vision of developing an advanced rehabilitation centre at Sheba. "I met with the director general and coincidentally, he had the same vision," he says. "And it got built in December 2003."

Galea hosted an educational seminar on the new centre at the University of Toronto's Rotman School of Management. He arranged parlour meetings and spearheaded the successful building of a new Canadian Friends of Sheba chapter.

"We were able to raise $400,000 for rehab supplies and equipment for the hospital. We also help other hospitals throughout the world," he says. "We were able to take a portion of what we sent to Israel and forward some of it to the recent Asian disaster."

Galea's next project involves setting up 10 mobile rehabilitation units in Israel. "They will go out to remote areas to provide rehabilitation services for soldiers and victims of terror who have less serious injuries but don't need hospital facilities," he says.

He has been asked to serve as the chief medical officer of the Maccabi Games this summer. As well, the Sport Medicine Society for Israel of Tel Aviv University has invited him to be the keynote speaker at its annual conference this July.

Galea, 45, was brought up in a Roman Catholic home in Etobicoke but he has learned to quote the Torah. "I wanted to understand the people [of Israel], their God and myself. I follow the parshah every week and read the commentaries," he says.

"I've been very lucky. This whole experience has opened up a spiritual side of me and given me some truths – seeing the anti-Semitism and hatred that surrounds Israel and the Jews."

Married with five children, Galea spends 10 days to two weeks every two or three months in Israel at the Sheba Hospital.

For more information or to contact the Canadian Friends of Chaim Sheba Hospital, call 416-363-0600 or visit www.sheba.co.il.

CHAT Tigers roar through banner year

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

The school administration has given them the green light to play.

Now it's up to the senior boys basketball team at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) to earn a first-ever berth in next month's Ontario Federation of School Athletic Associations (OFSAA) provincial championships.

The Tigers ended up 9-1 (29-6 overall, including tournaments) and in second place in the Toronto District Colleges Athletic Association (TDCAA) east division after defeating Mary Ward recently.

The record is the school's best in its 45-year history and comes after winning only one league game all last season.

The Tigers are led by Jared Mintz, a 6-7 post player who won a bronze medal with Canada's under-17 squad at last summer's Pan Am Maccabi Games in Chile. He'll represent Canada along with teammates Noah Kadish and Zack Isakow at the Maccabiah Games in Israel in July.

Forward Ryan Tevel and guard Kevin Treger round out the starting five on an 18-man roster.

The Tigers were scheduled to open the playoffs on home court last week. Monsignor Johnson appeared to pose the biggest threat to CHAT's OFSAA aspirations as the league's two premiere clubs, Mother Teresa and Henry Carr, opted to compete for a spot in the AAAA playoffs.

"It's very doable," said second year coach Sy Herling, who runs 6 a.m. practices three times a week.

"The boys are always there and are very dedicated. They love to play basketball."

It wasn't even possible to get to the OFSAA playoffs in the past, because games were always played on weekends and conflicted with Shabbat.

Then again, up to now, CHAT had never been good enough to have to worry about it.

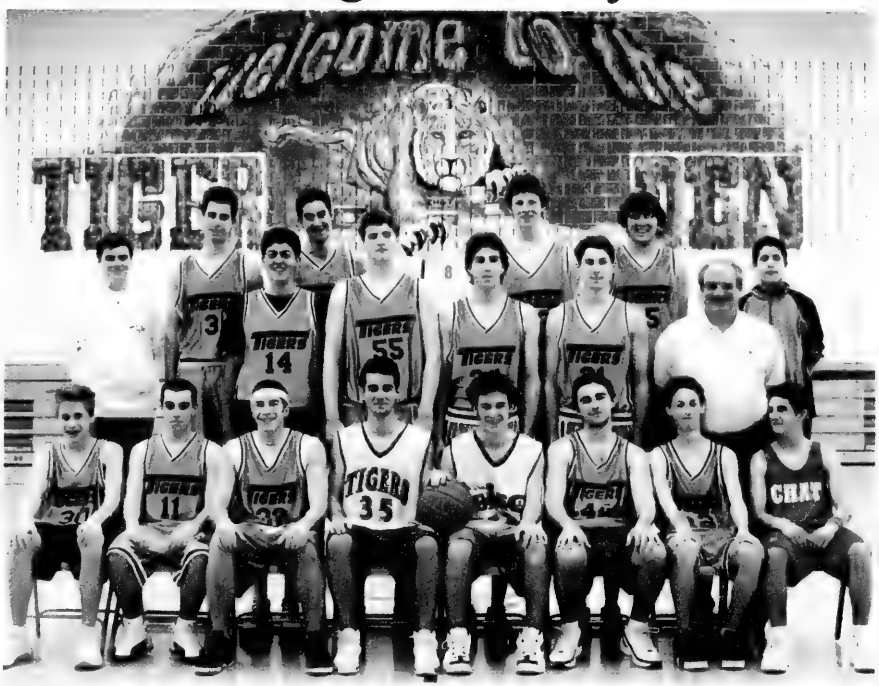
Prior to the start of the current season, OFSAA switched the playoffs to a format that will see games played early in the week, Monday through Wednesday.

It recently seemed, however, that CHAT would be denied the opportunity to compete for the AAA Ontario title because of a commitment it made back in the fall to participate in early March in a Jewish high school tournament in Baltimore during the five days leading up to the OFSAA playoffs.

(Based on size, CHAT is considered a AA team. However, because the AA playoffs are in Chatham this year and begin the same day the Tigers will be returning from Baltimore, at the beginning of the year CHAT declared itself eligible for the AAA tourney, which is being held in Newmarket. Schools can only declare themselves to be moving up a level, not down.)

After initially ruling that the Tigers could not participate in both tournaments because the players would miss too much class by playing seven days in a row, CHAT officials relented.

At a meeting earlier this month, school staff overwhelmingly supported the idea of the Tigers going to Baltimore and then taking part in the three-day AAA OFSAA playoffs if they qualified, and the administration followed the staff's recommendation.



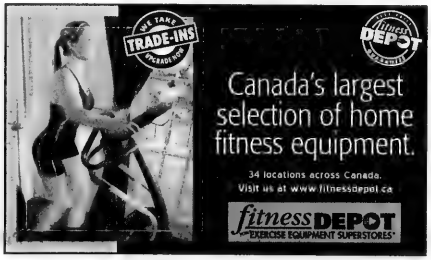
The CHAT Tigers took second place in the Toronto District Colleges Athletic Association east division, earning a first-ever berth in next month's Ontario Federation of School Athletic Associations provincial championships. The record is the school's best in its 45-year history.

Despite not being able to take part in major tournaments because of Shabbat, CHAT has competed in a number of smaller events on Sundays.

The host Tigers captured the ninth Annual Israel Becker Memorial Tournament in December, a North American Jewish high school event, defeating Ramaz from New York 55-46 in the championship game.

"We all work as a team," said Isakow, a senior point guard who's taking next year off to go study in Israel.

"[A lot of us] have been playing with each other for four years, but I didn't expect us to be doing this well. We've worked pretty hard this year to get where we are."



Fitness trainer an award-winning competitive cyclist

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Merrill Collins feels like she's running out of time, but the 37-year-old cyclist plans to give it her all and enjoy the remaining few years that she will compete on her bike.

Since taking up road racing in 1999, Collins has captured the Ontario Cup, a series of 12 events running from April to September, in each of the past five seasons.

She was also named female athlete of the year four times by the Ontario Cycling Association.

A former mountain bike racer, Collins was introduced to road racing when she accompanied co-worker Darko Ficko to a competition and did well.

She discovered that she enjoyed competing on the road more than on dirt trails.

"I've always been athletic and done some form of racing," said Collins, a personal fitness trainer who works out of the Dunfield Club in Toronto. "[Initially], I did road racing to help my mountain bike racing."

Collins and her coach Ficko train together year-round, spending about 90 minutes a day riding a stationary bike.

They both won bronze medals at last June's National Individual Time Trials in Kamloops, B.C., suiting up for a three-member team called Labicicletta that also included Heath Cockburn.

"I never expected to be where I am today with this," said Collins. "I just want to continue to be successful and do well at nationals. I'm not a young kid any more."

She said this is nothing more than a hobby that has turned into a success. It's given her a great deal of fun, something Collins would love to carry on doing as long as she possibly can. "I love riding my bike," she said. "There's nothing more exhilarating. I can forget about everything. It's my time and I love it."

GRILLED BRIE, APPLE AND WATERCRESS SANDWICHES

8x1" diagonally sliced baguette pieces
1 1/2 tblsps. unsalted butter, softened
6 oz. firm-ripe Brie, cut into thin wedges
1/2 Gala apple, halved lengthwise, cored, and cut into thin slices
1 cup tender watercress

Spread 1 side of each baguette slice with butter. Turn over 4 slices. Place cheese and apple slices on baguette pieces. Season apple with salt and pepper and top with remaining 4 baguette slices, buttered sides up.

Heat a dry skillet over moderate heat until hot, then cook sandwiches, pressing occasionally, turning over once, until bread is golden brown and cheese is melted, about 5 minutes total. Tuck watercress into sandwiches.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

"The law of the land is the law." This is a fundamental principle that obligates Jewish people to be loyal citizens of whatever country they may live in.

It is so important that in most circumstances of conflict between Torah and secular law, it is secular law that takes precedence. So while Jewish law may not convict based on circumstantial evidence alone, one could technically serve as a Crown prosecutor and gain conviction against Jews based on such evidence.

Similarly, while Torah law demands that many workers be paid on a daily basis, a Jewish employer in Canada would not be expected to follow this unconventional practice. What is truly amazing is that this law was formulated when Jews lived under repressive regimes that had no concept of democratic rights and principles. Taxes had to be paid even if the king spent the monies for personal enrichment.

Thus it is even more important to abide by all civil and criminal laws in the wonderful, freedom-loving countries where most Jews reside today. Only if the laws are clearly discriminatory – for example taxes directed at Jews only or at those with red hair for that matter – can one attempt to ignore the law.

Nevertheless, Canadian law must not serve as a replacement for Jewish law. Civil disputes between Jews must be brought before a competent beit din (court of Jewish law) for resolution, but the resolution must take into account the relevant secular law. To do otherwise would send a message that Jewish law is incapable of dealing with issues related to the modern economy, that Judaism is basically a series of religious rituals divorced from real world issues.

Such an approach would be a distortion of all we believe – that Judaism is a living way of life that can intelligently confront (though not necessarily solve) all that life has to offer.

Living in Canada, we cannot force anyone to appear before a beit din, and if faced with a refusal to do this, the Jewish courts would recommend that one pursue justice in a secular court. Unfortunately, this is an area where much work still remains. Our communal efforts have gone into education, outreach and social services, and we have not yet created the proper infrastructure for a fully functioning beit din system. Changing this reality will serve as a sanctification of Torah.

David Rosenzweig: A No-Trial Trial

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Had a trial taken place to determine Christopher McBride's guilt for killing David Rosenzweig, we would have witnessed a slow motion re-enactment of the moments prior to, during and after the crime, to determine intent, motivation and a perceived "reality" of what occurred.

Instead, a guilty plea negated a trial and a meticulous dissection of the actions surrounding David's death on July 14, 2002. Despite this, questions surrounding the murder still require brave examination by our community, so that we will be able to repair some of the things that are broken from within.

McBride went to a strip plaza at Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street on a Saturday night to buy drugs. Why would a career addict choose to purchase drugs in a strip plaza frequented by Jews, including haredi yeshiva students?

It seems that McBride did indeed know, through the drug grapevine, that illegal substances were available at that strip plaza. Drug dealing at that corner was not a well-kept secret. In fact, drugs of all flavours are readily available at many such corners in our community.

The question, therefore, that needs to be addressed is: why is the supply and demand for drugs and alcohol so great in our neighbourhoods?

Let's be blunt. Many members of the Jewish community – some as young as 14 – are alcoholics and/or hooked on dangerous substances, including heroin and crack. This problem exists in our day schools, yeshivot and shuls, and it affects all denominations. Every day, through my work with the homeless and affiliation with organizations such as JACS (which works with Jewish substance abusers), I hear about another Jewish youth in drug rehabilitation.

The question our leaders, including the Va'ad Harabonim and Toronto Board of Rabbis, courageously need to address is: why are many of our youth in so much pain that they jab their veins with needles?

Had their been a trial, this question would have punched us in the face. Instead, it is left up to us to deal with, for the sake of our children.

Had there been a trial, we likely would have asked: why are we not street-proofing our community?

On the evening of July 14, 2002, McBride pranced up a ramp to a pizza parlour, then entered and exited the eatery, all the while harassing the Saturday night crowd. Some individuals called 911 when a knife appeared, but others – campers – actually mocked McBride, a man clearly inebriated and oozing hatred.

Why was most of this Saturday night crowd unaware of how to deal with such an individual? Why are we not street-proofing our community members, despite the fact we consistently bemoan the level of anti-Semitism in our streets?

Furthermore, what of these campers? Did it not occur to them that verbally jabbing an intoxicated maniac, after seeing "fuck cops" tattooed on his knuckles, might be perilous and demonstrate a lack of derech eretz (respect) toward themselves and the Jewish community?

Some journalists in the mainstream media suggested that the campers' disrespect gave McBride a reason for his deadly actions. This in itself is disrespectful. McBride murdered David because of the criminality of his 21 miserable years leading up to that night – not the ignorant trickery of foolish little boys.

Had there been a trial, however, we would have wondered about the crudity of these campers and why they didn't understand that derech eretz is something we actualize because of who we are, not for the sake of the criminal standing opposite us.

Finally, how come no one from that camp ever called my sister Chavi to express condolences and apologize for the campers' behaviour?

David is gone. There will be no trial, except the one we impose upon ourselves.

GLADS

Welcome to Gladstone's Wine Bar & Grill, offering you two levels of elegant hospitality but only one level of service... exceptional! Whether you are joining family and friends in a private celebration, enjoying an intimate dinner or a casual get-together over coffee and dessert, Gladstone's is the place to be.

Gladstone's Wine Bar & Grill is also the setting for one of the city's most exclusive private event venues, offering complete on-site Glatt Kosher catering as well as a full range of in-house event planning services. From luxurious wedding receptions to Bar/Bat Mitzvahs, engagement parties, cocktail receptions, corporate events and family gatherings, Gladstone's is the perfect venue for groups of twenty to three hundred and fifty.

Sunday through Thursday, enjoy fine dining in our spacious yet intimate setting among fine art, flowing water fountains and a cozy fireplace. Savour one of our signature cuts of Black Angus beef, aged 21 days and charbroiled to your liking. Join us for a pre-theatre aperitif and pasta or late night coffee and dessert on the mezzanine. Linger over drinks by the fireplace in our cozy lounge or make yourself comfortable at our spectacular bar to enjoy fine wines, cocktails and light fare from our imaginative bar menu. Our beautifully appointed Private Dining Room is also available for groups of up to 45 guests. Live Jazz on Thursday evenings brings an added touch of New Orleans joie-de-vivre to your visit.

Mid-town Toronto meets New York, California and the Orient in a fusion of innovative menu offerings created by world-class culinary talents under the direction of Executive Chef Amini. Let our professional and knowledgeable staff serve you as the entire Gladstone's team comes together to exceed your expectations as you enjoy an unforgettable dining experience.

Every occasion deserves to be celebrated at Gladstone's.

Zero-20 Bambini: Quality Kidswear

Zero-20 Bambini offers everything you need in dressy kidswear for babies to pre-teens -- whether it's a casual outfit for a visit to Bubbie, or a long dress for a bat mitzvah. "Our merchandise," says proprietor Santina Mariani, is "what movie stars dress their kids in."

The range of brands includes European imports, and North American designers. Deuxpardeux for example, a Canadian designer, is known for knitted dress-and-sweater ensembles.

"Parents spend more on kidswear these days," observes Mariani, "so they want quality. Also, I'm selling outfits, more than single articles. When people spend more, they like to match, with more accessories for a total look."

"It's fabric, design and quality of work that determine price," Mariani says. "Twenty years ago, price was based more on label. Today, consumers are more knowledgeable and more demanding; and I welcome this. It's my role to educate the consumer.

"The more demanding consumer," Mariani continues, "also wants better service. We go all-out to provide what you want. Seamstresses on site do alterations, and some of our suppliers do custom work."

Zero-20 Bambini has two locations: their boutique in Woodbridge; and the Zero-20 Bambini Clearance Outlet at Bathurst and Lawrence, in Winners Plaza beside the Shoe Co.

At season's end, they clear the boutique at half price; what's left goes to the clearance outlet at savings of 50-70%. A flower girl dress, for instance, would go for $59-99; a $100 outfit would go for $39-49. And this is all new, quality merchandise.

"About 99% of our customers come back," Mariani says. "Some people expect us to be expensive; but when they step inside, they get a pleasant surprise. Our goods are better; but our prices are good too. You don't have to be rich to dress like a movie star."

"We've had an incredible response to the clearence store" says Mariani, "customers remark that they can now buy trendy European clothing at the same price you find at the mall.

Do yourself a favour and go take a peek. You'll be so happy you did."

For your special convenience, Zero-20's clearance store in Lawrence Plaza is open Monday to Thursday evenings till 9 p.m., Friday & Saturday 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. and Sunday 12 p.m. to 5 p.m.

The Israeli under-18 junior national team celebrate an on-ice victory during its hockey tour of Toronto last week. [Tony Lombardo photo]

Israeli juniors get star treatment in hockey-starved Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Raviv Bull isn't used to being treated like a movie star. But there he was with his teammates, strolling through the Yorkdale Shopping Centre, wearing his Israeli team sweatshirt, when total strangers rushed up to him and asked if he was the guy from the visiting hockey team.

The attention took him by surprise, he said. "It's weird. I felt like Brad Pitt."

Yes, this year's visit by Israel's under-18 junior national team has caused quite a stir – but it's certainly not because of the team's mesmerizing hockey talent. They're admittedly a motley assortment of players with limited skills, but when you can boast NHL calibre coaching, people take notice.

Former Montreal Canadiens coach Jean Perron, who has a Stanley Cup (1986) and a Canada Cup (1987) to his credit, is the man behind the Israelis' bench and will lead the team at this month's International Ice Hockey Federation Division III championships in Sofia, Bulgaria.

> Former Montreal Canadiens bench boss Jean Perron coaches the Israelis

Perron, who won the Stanley Cup with Montreal, will also help run a hockey camp in Metulla this summer, while other notable NHL personages, including Ken Hitchcock, Mike Keenan and Ted Nolan, are also expected to attend.

In a hockey-starved environment, the travails of the Israeli juniors has caught the attention of the Canadian media in a big way. The Israelis, used to bumming rides to their home rink and practising in total obscurity, find themselves media darlings in hockey-mad Toronto.

Still, it's important to focus at the task at hand, said Bull, the team's lanky captain. Despite three practices a week back home, the Israelis' trip to Toronto and earlier, to Los Angeles, has

Israel hosts top cops, space execs

Two first-time, historic missions to Israel this week, one by Ontario police chiefs and the other by executives of the Canadian Space Agency, will continue to strengthen relations between the countries, organizers say.

Two dozen law enforcement officials from across Ontario, including provincial Community Safety Minister Monte Kwinter and former Toronto police chief Julian Fantino, are in Israel until March 8 on a groundbreaking trip during which they are conferring with their Israeli counterparts on security and anti-terrorism measures.

The police chiefs began their trip March 1 and are scheduled to meet Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz. The Canadians are being hosted by Gideon Ezra, Israel's minister of public security.

They are also slated to hold talks with high-level members of the Israel Defence Forces and with Palestinian police officials to discuss, among other things, controversial Israeli military checkpoints that Palestinian civilians must cross to enter Israel.

The News in Brief

CANADA

JNF Bestows Honour

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg-based Asper Foundation will be honoured at the Jewish National Fund of Canada's Negev Gala Concert in Winnipeg on June 15, the first time JNF Canada's highest community honour will go to a foundation and not an individual or a couple. The award recognizes exemplary community vision and commitment, and over the last 20 years, the foundation has spent millions on human rights, health, culture, training, education and community support initiatives in Israel and Winnipeg, said Rami Kleinmann, JNF's emissary to the Prairie region.

Councillor Backs CJC

VANCOUVER — Councillor Tim Stevenson wants Vancouver city council to endorse Canadian Jewish Congress' long-standing request for the province's Liberal government to expand and restore funding to British Columbia's hate crimes team. Stevenson – a member of Mayor Larry Campbell's Coalition of Progressive Electors, as well as Canada's first openly gay Christian minister and a former provincial NDP cabinet minister – made the call last month after a B.C. Supreme Court judge sentenced a man to six years in jail for manslaughter in a 2001 gang attack on a gay man, the Vancouver Courier reported. The judge refused to label the killing a hate crime, which would have allowed for a longer sentence, even though it took place on a popular gay stroll in the city's Stanley Park. Two juveniles were also convicted in the crime and a second man was acquitted.

WORLD

Attacks Condemned

PARIS — French Interior Minister Dominique de Villepin described two recent attacks, in which swastikas were painted on a wall of Paris' Grand Mosque and a bomb was thrown at a train car used by the Nazis to deport Jews, as "unspeakable and ignominious." Muslim and Jewish leaders also condemned them.

Students Threatened

PITTSBURGH — Jewish students at Carnegie Mellon University were singled out for harassment by a controversial black figure during a speech at the Pittsburgh school. Jewish students were asked to identify themselves at last month's lecture by New Black Panther Party leader Malik Shabazz and then were threatened. Students who admitted to being Zionists were told they would be watched, said Aaron Weil, executive director of Hillel's Jewish University Center of Pittsburgh. Anti-hate groups such as the Anti-Defamation League and the Southern Poverty Law Center have long warned against Shabazz's hateful rhetoric. University officials hosted a town meeting in response to the speech.

YWCA Report Stands

PHOENIX — At a meeting in Phoenix last month, a board representing the YWCA movement in the United States failed to condemn a report comparing Israeli actions to those of the Nazis. A motion against the 2004 Witness Report, written by members of the World YWCA, failed, with five members in favour and 11 opposed. The report said Israel is trying to "rid the land of the Palestinians" just as "Hitler tried to exterminate the Jews."

Envoy Heckled

FLORENCE — Pro-Palestinian students interrupted a talk last week by Israel's ambassador to Italy at the University of Florence. Rome's mayor and other politicians sharply condemned the incident after Ehud Gol was heckled during a speech on prospects for Mideast peace by some 20 students shouting slogans such as "Sharon assassin" and "Free Palestine." Gol continued his talk after security removed the protesters.

CJC Lauds Budget Initiatives

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress says it welcomes Ottawa's "renewed commitment" in last week's budget to funding prosecutions of present-day and Nazi war criminals.

CJC president Ed Morgan said Congress "strongly urge[s] the War Crimes Program to continue bringing forward World War II cases, while the window of opportunity still exists."

Congress also commended Ottawa's funding of two Heritage Department programs. The first is the Action Plan Against Racism, billed as a comprehensive campaign to fight racism in Canada. "We expect that this initiative will include an action plan to deal with anti-Semitism, which, sadly, is the blueprint for racism to this very day," Morgan said.

CJC also lauded the funding of "commemorative and educational programs… about dark episodes in our history involving specific ethno-cultural communities."

In a statement, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto said it was pleased with the budget's "considerable increases" for social services, particularly for immigrant integration and the maximum guaranteed income supplement for seniors. But it was disappointed with the "absence of any additional capital gains tax relief" as it relates to the charitable sector.

Weekly UWO Chabad 'family' dinners draw 300

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

For many Jewish students in London, Ont., Chabad of Western has become the in place to go for Shabbat dinner.

Two years ago, when Caryn Walt, a fourth-year psychology student, began attending Chabad's Friday night services and dinner, she was one of only a dozen to two dozen people there.

The dinners now attract two to three hundred people a week, a phenomenal increase Walt attributes in large part to Chabad shlichim Rabbi Mordechai Silberberg and his wife Nechamie, who arrived in London five years ago.

Gary Diamond, president of Canadian Federation of Jewish Students and past president of Hillel at the University of Western Ontario, makes time to help out Friday nights at Chabad. "It's just the atmosphere," he said. "It's not like you have to dress up. You just come, and can meet people. It has all the ingredients: good people, free food. It's a place to catch up [with friends]."

In addition to Shabbat dinners, Chabad runs Saturday morning and holiday services. The 28-year-old rabbi has a Tuesday evening campus radio show, and runs educational programs, including Talmud classes, lunch-and-learns, and a late-night discussion group in which topics range from premarital sex to bioethics. Nechamie, 25, has taught monthly Rosh Chodesh classes for women, and now teaches occasional and one-on-one classes.

Disbelief, if not outrage

Can anyone respond, other than with disbelief if not even with profound outrage, to the statements attributed in the newspaper last weekend to Ernst Zundel's lawyer, Peter Lindsay?

In advising the public that his client, a Holocaust denier, was no longer going to try to fight deportation to Germany, Lindsay told the Globe and Mail that "our system has failed Mr. Zundel."

From the editor's desk

The comment was made in relation to the 64-page ruling last week by Justice Pierre Blais of the Federal Court, upholding the reasonability of the national security certificate under which Zundel was being detained. Blais' ruling effectively put paid to Zundel's long stay in Canada.

As of this writing, Zundel had not yet been deported. But it was anticipated and hoped that the self-styled "guru of the right" would be on his way to a jail in Germany this week. The reason jail awaits him in Germany is because he faces an arrest warrant on charges of inciting hatred.

Lindsay was particularly bitter at the use by the government of the controversial national security certificate, which can prevent an accused from scrutinizing the evidence against him.

We make no case on behalf of the resort to the certificate. It is a highly unusual procedure that runs counter to the traditions of our criminal law jurisprudence.

The law of Canada enables the use of the certificate in rare and exceptional circumstances. We rely on the integrity of the ministers of the crown who signed the certificate, acting on the advice of the state's security officials, that the circumstances surrounding Zundel satisfied the very high threshold of being rare and exceptional.

We also rely upon the integrity of the judge who upheld the certificate's validity in these circumstances. And in that regard, Blais' finding was unequivocal.

"Mr. Zundel's activities are not only a threat to Canada's national security, but also a threat to the international community of nations," he wrote.

To say, however, that "our system has failed Mr. Zundel" is to twist truth into an unrecognizable, dark shape.

Zundel has enjoyed the sanctuary of the Canadian judicial system for more than two decades. Indeed, these latest legal battles were the result of his deportation from the United States nearly two years ago. The Americans wanted nothing to do with him.

He moved to Tennessee in 2000 prior to a January 2002 ruling by the Canadian Human Rights Commission that a website he controlled spread anti-Semitic messages. Subsequently, Zundel ran afoul of the United States' rigorous immigration requirements and was deported back to Canada. It still puzzles a great many people why our government agreed to accept Zundel back into Canada. He was not a citizen, nor has he ever been a citizen of Canada. In fact, he expressed loud and derisive relief in finally being rid of Canada when he packed his bags for the storied mountaintops of Tennessee.

Moreover, the federal government only invoked the security certificate proceedings after Zundel failed three times since his 2003 deportation to successfully prove he is a refugee.

Lindsay cries that "our system failed" his client yet in the same breath discloses that "we have been through the Superior Court of Ontario, the Ontario Court of Appeal, the Supreme Court of Canada, Federal Court and the Federal Court of Appeal. The only ones we haven't tried are traffic court and small-claims court." The irony is lost on Lindsay.

I imagine it would be hard to find in all of Canadian judicial history any litigant who has appeared before the courts of the land more than Zundel. And Lindsay's recitation does not include the regulatory bodies before which Zundel has appeared or the many trial and appellate courts in whose defendant's docket the graphic artist from the Carlton Street bunker sat in the 1980s and '90s.

To say, as Lindsay did, that "our system has failed Mr. Zundel" is to scoff at the numerous judges at numerous trial and appellate levels who have heard and pronounced upon his case. Millions of Canadian taxpayers' dollars have been spent in those trials and appeals and various other hearings.

But Lindsay's statement about our system failing Zundel was not his only outrageous musing. "His [Zundel's] views are not popular, but he has always discouraged violence," Lindsay added.

Physical assault, however, is hardly the end of the meaning of the word "violence." For many, the propagation of anti-Semitism is itself a gross and hideous form of violence, an assault against human dignity. Indeed, it was former Canadian Chief Justice Brian Dickson who pointed out that "Auschwitz began with words."

Blais accepted the evidence that "Ernst Zundel is viewed by white supremacists as a leader of international significance and was viewed as the patriarch of the movement in Canada for decades. [He] is one of the world's most prominent distributors of revisionist neo-Nazi propaganda."

The Canadian justice system did not fail Zundel. He failed himself. What will he have to say about the German justice system?

Last week, I wrote that Wayne Gretzky hailed from Brampton, Ont. Of course that was wrong. Gretzky was born in Brantford. I apologize to Gretzky and the people of Brantford, but in a way, all Ontario, not just Brantford, claims him.

Zundel deportation could be imminent

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Federal Court judge has paved the way for the removal of neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel from a "safe haven" in Canada to his native Germany. Zundel could be deported as early as this week.

Noting that Zundel voluntarily "abandoned" Canada in 2000 in the hopes of obtaining American citizenship, Judge Pierre Blais rejected contentions Zundel was being deprived of fundamental rights.

"I have no doubt regarding the fairness and legality of the process and I have no doubt that the evidence in support of the certificate conclusively established that Mr. Zundel represents a danger for the security of Canada," Blais stated.

The decision was applauded by Jewish organizations who had been monitoring his activities for decades and urging his removal ever since he was deported from the United States to Canada in February 2003.

"It was a long time coming," said Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress. "I wish it had only taken weeks instead of years."

"We are consulting with the German embassy in order to ascertain how soon they will accept Zundel back to his native country. There must be no more excuses or further delays," said Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive director.

The relatively quick time frame for removal came after Zundel announced he would not contest the deportation order. Defence lawyer Peter Lindsay told the Globe and Mail that his client concluded he could not win a further court challenge and that "he is not going to bang his head against a wall any longer."

Zundel faces jail in Germany after being convicted in absentia there of a Holocaust-denial offence. He has been in custody for the past two years after U.S. authorities removed him when he overstayed a visitor's visa. He had been living in Tennessee with his wife, Ingrid Rimland.

Zundel moved to Canada from West Germany in 1958, but never acquired Canadian citizenship. In the mid-1980s, he became an international figure when he was convicted of "false news" charges that he distributed booklets that denied the Holocaust. The Supreme Court of Canada threw out the law, ruling it an unjustifiable restriction on freedom of expression.

Over the years, he became one of the foremost international distributors of Holocaust-denial material and became the self-described "guru of the right."

In a 63-page decision, Blais repeatedly discounted Zundel's description of himself as a defender of freedom of expression and an advocate of non-violence. He noted that Zundel freely associated with Nazis and racist extremists and that he opened his Toronto home to white supremacists from around the world.

"If, as Mr. Zundel claims, he is not on side with extremists, is not on side with people claiming that the Jews should be eliminated and is not on side with Canadian members of the Heritage Front [a Canadian white supremacist organization] that wanted to create a list of members of the Jewish movement for future retaliation, then how can he agree to participate in a meeting of the Heritage Front as a guest speaker, surrounded and supported by members of extremist white supremacist groups in Canada?" Blais wrote.

Referring to a number of examples of Zundel's acknowledged association with extremists, Blais said, "He simply cannot depict himself as a champion of free speech and of non-violence, while spending most of his time in touch with people who promote the opposite."

In addition, Blais repeatedly described Zundel as an untruthful witness.

"Based on what I saw, what I heard, and what was presented to me during the hearings, I have no hesitation in concluding his testimony lacked credibility on several crucial elements of the case."

Blais discounted suggestions the white supremacist movement is moribund, saying "Mr. Zundel's activities are not only a threat to Canada's national security but also a threat to the international community of nations. Mr. Zundel can channel the energy of members of the white supremacist movement from around the world, providing funding to them, bringing them together and providing them advice and direction.

"Mr. Zundel's freedom following two years of incarceration would no doubt galvanize the white supremacist movement. Mr. Zundel has the funding, the support, an established infrastructure, a means of communication to the masses via his Zundelsite as well as numerous individuals who are prepared to do his bidding. Mr. Zundel is capable of bringing all this back together and once again spurring the white supremacist movement."

Morgan said Zundel served as "the linchpin in that movement. I'm hopeful that Holocaust-deniers around the world have suffered a major setback with the loss of his base in Canada."

'Last chance' to bring war criminals to justice

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Efraim Zuroff has been nothing if not persistent. For years he's been urging reluctant governments, particularly in the former Communist Bloc, to prosecute Nazi war criminals before time runs out.

As the biological clock continues to tick 60 years after the end of the Holocaust, the Simon Wiesenthal Center and Zuroff, the director of its Jerusalem office, have started using a novel approach: offering substantial cash rewards for information leading to the conviction and punishment of war criminals.

Efraim Zuroff

The Simon Wiesenthal Center, in conjunction with the Tirgum Shlishi Foundation, a Florida charitable organization headed by philanthropist Aryeh Rubin, are offering rewards of up to $10,000 as part of Operation: Last Chance.

So far, the program has been introduced in a handful of European countries, including Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Poland, Austria, Croatia and Germany.

A few weeks ago, it was launched in Hungary where it has generated more than 329 leads, 78 of which have been passed along to local prosecutors.

"Eastern Europe is in desperate need of Nazi war crimes trials," said Zuroff, who was in Toronto and Winnipeg recently.

Not only was it the place where most Jews were murdered, but many of the perpetrators continue to reside there, he said.

Zuroff said one of the goals of Operation: Last Chance is to spur governments to action, despite widespread reluctance to do so. Such an exercise will have valuable long-term benefits, he believes. Not only will those who committed horrendous deeds finally be brought to justice, but the trials and publicity surrounding the investigations will have a valuable educational component about the countries' real wartime activities, he said.

Prosecutions have proven unpopular in the three Baltic states, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia. "In the eyes of many Lithuanians, the people who assisted the Nazis were heroes because they also fought the communists," Zuroff stated. "The fact they murdered Jews doesn't factor in, for the most part."

Simon Wiesenthal Center gives Canada a 'B' rating

Only one country rated an "A" in the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Annual Status Report on the Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals.

The United States was granted the top mark for its "highly successful investigation and prosecution program" in the period from April 1, 2003 to March 31, 2004.

Canada and Germany each scored "B," the only two countries "taking necessary measures to enable the proper investigation and prosecution of Nazi war criminals and [registering] at least one conviction and/or [filing] two indictments during the period under review," the report stated.

Five countries – Austria, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania and Poland – rated a "C," while the majority of states earned a "D" or worse.

"The Center's experience has clearly shown that the existence of political will to bring Nazi war criminals to justice is an absolute prerequisite for the successful prosecution of Holocaust perpetrators. In that respect, the results achieved in this field are often just as much a function of the existent political climate, as of the strength of the evidence available against the suspects in question," the report stated.

During the period studied, the United States was the only country to register any convictions (seven) while also leading the way in launching five new cases. Canada initiated three new cases and Germany two.

In Canada, Vancouver resident Michael Seifert, who was convicted in absentia by an Italian court for murdering, torturing and raping prisoners at the Bolzano detention camp, faced loss of citizenship.

Other citizenship revocation cases were launched against Jura Slomatczuk, an alleged armed guard at the Trawniki training camp and an alleged guard at the Sachsenhausen and Mauthhausen concentration camps; and against Josef Furman, an alleged armed guard at the Trawniki training cap and an alleged participant in the liquidation of the Warsaw Ghetto in April and May of 1943.

The Status Report found that Poland launched the largest number of new investigations (172), followed by Austria (60), the United States (40), Italy and Lithuania (18 each) and Latvia (16). Canada did not provide statistics on new investigations.

Skinheads face new trials for promoting hatred

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Six skinheads will face new trials on charges they promoted hatred against Roma (Gypsies) after the Supreme Court of Canada overturned lower court decisions that had acquitted them.

In a 9-0 decision, the Supreme Court ruled the trial judge had focused too narrowly on a single issue – whether Roma and Gypsies were the same identifiable group – while not considering all the evidence before the court.

"It is incumbent upon the trial judge to look at the totality of the evidence and draw appropriate inferences to determine whether the [six defendants] intended to target 'any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin,' in this case, the Roma people," the court wrote.

The High Court also stated the trial judge could have taken "judicial notice" of the interchangeability of the terms Roma and Gypsy by accepting a standard dictionary definition.

At trial, Judge Russell Otter accepted a defence contention that the Crown had failed to prove its case that the defendants promoted hatred against Roma. Evidence at trial, the judge stated, specified only Gypsies and the Crown failed to prove the two groups were one and the same.

The charges arose out of an Aug. 26, 1997, demonstration by about 25 people outside the Lido Motel in Scarborough, Ont., where Roma refugee claimants were being temporarily housed. The demonstrators, described by the High Court as wearing "typical skinhead accoutrements," carried placards saying, "Honk if you hate Gypsies," "Canada is not a trash can," and "You're a cancer to Canada."

In addition, the protesters chanted "Gypsies out," and "white power." Some gave the Nazi salute while Nazi and Confederate flags were displayed.

David Matas

The Supreme Court said, "The ethnic flavour of the demonstration, the fact it was situated outside a motel housing refugee claimants who were at times described by the witnesses as Roma, and the fact that Roma people are a group historically persecuted by the Nazis while the Nazi theme was apparent at the demonstration were all factors to consider, in addition to the actual words used, in determining whether Roma were the target of hate speech."

Ron Lee, chair of the Roma Community Centre of Toronto, applauded the Supreme Court decision for overturning an "unjustified" lower court ruling. "The original decision was based purely on semantic juggling," he said.

"If these people could get away with it by playing with words… the message to others is that there's no problem here, a judge will assume it's a prank like a panty raid."

Joel Richler, chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "We felt very strongly...that a dramatic change was required in this case, and believe that the Crown will easily prove in a new trial that hate was a motivating factor for the defendants."

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said the Supreme Court handed down "a common sense judgment that was a long time coming to right a wrong."

David Matas, senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada, said, "We are pleased the Supreme Court of Canada agreed with our basic premise that hate should never be dismissed on the basis of a mere technicality."

Congress and B'nai Brith Canada were both interveners in the appeal.

Dismantle terrorism, don't pander to it

The murder of five Israelis and wounding of some 50 others in Tel Aviv last Friday night should prove to Palestine Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas that there can be no truce or accommodation with terrorists. After a perfunctory denial of responsibility immediately after the bombing, Islamic Jihad claimed credit for the killing the very next day. They released their video, condemned the Israelis and praised their martyr.

Abbas pledged to track down those responsible for the killings. But the measure of his resolve will be in his actions, not in his statements. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made this point very clear to the PA over the weekend. "It is essential that Palestinian leaders take immediate, credible steps to find those responsible for this terrorist attack and bring them to justice. We understand that the Palestinian leadership has condemned the attack. We now must see actions that send a clear message that terror will not be tolerated," she said.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon impressed the very same point upon the newly elected PA leadership. He warned that there will be no progress in the peace process unless Abbas cracks down on all of the terror organizations, not just on Islamic Jihad. He also instructed Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz to operate against Islamic Jihad.

Sharon knows that Israel is in a very delicate political position. He does not want to halt the disengagement process; yet attacks against Israelis will surely sour the Israeli public against disengagement. He wants to allow Abbas sufficient freedom to operate against the terrorists, but he will not surrender Israel's defence of its citizens to the PA. The resulting security measures by the IDF, he knows, may in turn sour the Palestinian public against Abbas. In either scenario, progress toward a peace agreement may be stymied.

Last week, Brig.-Gen. Yossi Kupperwasser, head of the research branch of military intelligence, told the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee that Hamas, Islamic Jihad and al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades were continuing to shore up their infrastructure and develop new weapons to launch against Israel. In fact, he testified that, if relations between Israel and the PA break down, he expects a "vigorous" new terror campaign in the days to come, particularly after the PA legislative elections slated for July 20.

And, of course, that is precisely the terrorists' aim. They want to sabotage that relationship. They want to eliminate the possibility of a peace agreement with Israel because they want to eliminate Israel. They are opposed to the very idea, let alone the existence, of a sovereign Jewish state in the Middle East. Mahmoud Abbas cannot compromise with that ambition. Nor can he pander to it. He must unequivocally dismantle the groups who hold it.

Same-sex marriage and civil rights

I am writing about Rabbi Mendel Kaplan's Feb. 17 column ("Matches made in heaven?").

Rabbi Kaplan assumes far too much. This observant, happily married Jew feels neither chagrin nor disgust at the concept of gay marriage.

It is manifestly unjust to deny a particular segment of civil society the same rights and freedoms as other segments of society. The proposed federal legislation applies only to civil marriage. Rabbi Kaplan is entitled to refuse to officiate at a homosexual marriage, since Canada's constitution protects religious freedoms.

If Rabbi Kaplan wants to preserve families, he must remember that there are many gay and lesbian families, so I hope he will abandon this thinly disguised form of heterosexism and give his fullest support to people's desire for full equality in the civil domain. Anything less would be a betrayal of Torah.

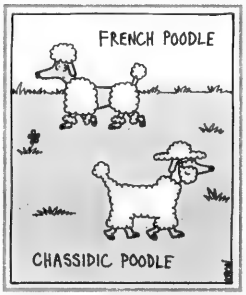
Free will and homosexuality

All the recent talk about same-sex marriage comes from one extreme or the other. One extreme looks down on those with homosexual feelings, the other accepts it. Both are wrong.

After all these years, no conclusive proof exists to say that homosexuality is genetic and/or unalterable. However, there is much proof stating same-sex attraction is a consequence of poor parenting or other social ills such as bullying, and that a behaviour that develops can be "undeveloped."



That's why, when the Torah says that homosexuality is an abomination, it means that no person can be locked into this behaviour. While free will dictates that one always has the choice between right and wrong, a person with same-sex attraction feels as if they're hard-wired that way. The choice then is between seeking help and accepting the inclination. The problem is, society has failed to offer the proper understanding and assistance to a person with same-sex attraction and this is what has caused so much anguish and confusion.

The proper Jewish attitude is to denounce same-sex marriage and civil unions, be aware of the root problems that can cause homosexual feelings, have love and compassion for the people who have homosexual feelings and offer them help to overcome them. The law and 'select' groups

In his article "Religious tradition and Canadian law," (CJN, Feb. 17), Gerald L.Gall wrote that "the debate about the use of sharia underscores the notion that we may be moving away from a uniform legal system toward the application of specialized law to select groups."

Would he be so sanguine about moving away from a uniform legal system if white supremacism were the value being preached by a select group?Would he still want to give the law the flexibility to address diverse values and needs if the values being preached were those of a predatory sexual cult? Why does religion get the right to trump the protective egalitarianism inherent in Canadian law?

The application of sharia invites consideration as to whether our legal system should continue to apply to all members of society equally or whether it will allow itself to be subverted by the pleading of a special interest group. That the special interest group is religious in no way changes the fact that it is of special interest and anti-egalitarian.

Day school fees

As parents of two children who attended day schools – Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto – we would like to comment on the recent roundtable discussion of community spending, especially regarding education ("Community spending priorities: What to do when needs exceed resources," CJN, Feb. 24).

We believe strongly that more money should be going to the Jewish educational system. The schools do a wonderful job teaching Judaism, but many children miss out because parents can't take on the burden of day school fees.

The people fighting for government funding should be applauded, but the Ontario government has repeatedly stated that it won't spend the money. Given the political pressures it faces, funding is a low-priority issue for the government.

We understand that there are many competing demands for community money. Buildings are needed for bringing community members together, but they will eventually be empty if young people don't learn Yiddishkeit and why it is important to be part of the Jewish community. We have functioning buildings at the existing Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. Why are we planning to spend millions of dollars to demolish them and build new ones?

If other Jewish communities, such as Cleveland's, can take action to dramatically cut the cost of Jewish education, why can't Toronto's? A few years back, we kept talking about Jewish continuity. Well, you can't have continuity without Jewish education.

Put disengagement to a vote – a Canadian perspective

By DAVID W. S. YUDIN

There is a highly charged and recurring debate in Israel today. The issue: is a referendum consistent with the principles of parliamentary democracy? Apart from the small segment of the population that consists of constitutional lawyers, one would hardly expect this type of issue to arouse passions. But place this issue in the context of Prime Minster Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan and you have one of the most controversial issues in Israel today.

The debate in Israel is shifting from the merits of the disengagement plan – whether or not Israel should withdraw from the Gaza Strip and four isolated West Bank settlements – to whether or not there should be a referendum. Paradoxically, despite the fact that the disengagement plan is believed to have wide support among the public, with a few notable exceptions, it is the opponents of disengagement who have lined up in favour of a referendum, believing that it offers the best hope to prevent the implementation of the plan.

So far, Sharon has steadfastly refused to agree to a referendum in the face of mounting pressure. First, he outmanoeuvred Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Education Minister Limor Livnat, forcing them to back down from their threat to resign unless he agreed to hold a referendum. Sharon then survived the departure of the National Religious Party (NRP) from his coalition over the referendum issue by forming a new coalition with Labor and United Torah Judaism (UTJ). Finally, in a historic vote on Feb. 20, the new coalition government approved the disengagement plan. The cabinet decision was a victory for Sharon and other opponents of a plebiscite.

Nevertheless, Sharon's struggle with this issue is not yet over. Proponents of a referendum are still mobilizing to condition the implementation of disengagement on a "yes" vote in a national referendum through public pressure and by lobbying individual members of Knesset. Although referendum supporters have not yet managed to gain the support of the 61 members of Knesset necessary to force a referendum, support has recently come from unlikely quarters.

Rabbi Shalom Yosef Elyashiv, the spiritual leader of Degel Hatorah (one of the two factions comprising the UTJ), recently instructed his followers to support a referendum on disengagement. This announcement was unexpected, both because the UTJ is a member of the coalition, and especially because there has been strong historical opposition to referendums in haredi circles.

In addition, Sharon's own foreign minister, Silvan Shalom, announced that he plans to lead a campaign for a referendum, despite the fact that he voted with Sharon in approving the disengagement plan in the cabinet. There are now a total of 26 out of 40 members of Knesset from Sharon's own Likud party who have signed a petition calling for Sharon to hold a referendum. Most ominously, a core group of "rebels" from Likud are threatening to vote against the second reading of the budget in the Knesset unless Sharon agrees to a referendum. If the budget is not passed by March 31, the government will fall and the disengagement plan with it.

Nevertheless, Sharon is standing his ground, arguing that a referendum would only serve to slow down disengagement. According to Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Sharon's closest ally, a referendum "would create a dangerous precedent." Other prominent supporters of Sharon and members of Knesset have repeatedly stated that a referendum would undermine the sovereignty and legitimacy of the Knesset, and even threaten Israeli democracy. These fears, however, are exaggerated and misunderstand the role that a referendum can play in a democracy.

It is true that the referendum procedure may slow down the implementation of disengagement. On the other hand, a referendum may actually turn out to be a useful tool for Sharon in implementing the plan. Moreover, considering what is at stake for Israel, it becomes clear that a referendum would be appropriate in this situation.

For any country, it is hard to imagine a more fundamental issue than the redrawing of its own borders. This is all the more true for Israel in this context when the security advantages of such a move are still being debated by security experts, the internal opposition is fierce and the implementation of the plan involves the prospect of violent confrontations between settlers and the army.

It is no exaggeration to say that this may be one of the most significant decisions in the history of the country since the acceptance of partition in 1947 and the declaration of the state by David Ben-Gurion in 1948. Faced with such a monumental decision, it seems rather unpersuasive to resist a referendum on the grounds that it would "slow the process."

There are many historical examples where democracies on the cusp of fundamental changes bring these decisions to the people for a vote. Recent examples include the referendums that took place in many European countries on accession to the European Union and the adoption of the euro, and the referendums in Quebec over separation from Canada. While a referendum makes sense for any plan as significant as Sharon's, it is even more critical in the current context because the disengagement plan already suffers from a deficiency in democratic legitimacy.

Consider the background: Sharon became prime minister as leader of the largest block in the Knesset, the Likud, in Israel's last election and not as a result of a direct election for prime minister. Sharon and Likud ran on a platform directly opposed to a unilateral withdrawal from Gaza, which was the platform of the Labor party. Though one can argue that there are many good reasons why Sharon may have changed his mind or why the circumstances are now different, one thing is clear: The Likud's mandate was explicitly not to withdraw from Gaza.

More recently, Sharon put the disengagement plan to a vote among members of the Likud and lost. The vote had no legal effect but illustrates that the disengagement plan lacks support in the Likud party – the party with the mandate from the voters. Sharon did not have enough votes from his coalition to pass the plan in the Knesset, even after co-opting the Labor party to join, and he had to rely on the votes of the opposition Yachad party.

Sharon is, in effect, pushing through one of the most significant and fundamental changes in Israel's history on the basis of support from the very parties that he defeated in the election, a defeat due, at least partly, to their support for a withdrawal from Gaza. To say the least, this is not a shining example of democratic accountability and responsibility.

Although referendums have not previously played a role in Israeli democracy and are not enshrined in any of Israel's quasi-constitutional Basic Laws, a referendum in this case can play a valuable role by granting Sharon's plan the legitimacy that it is lacking. Given the wide support that disengagement has among the general population – a poll conducted on Feb. 21 by Keshet Yisrael revealed that 64.4 per cent of the Israeli public supports disengagement – it is indeed surprising that Sharon is not embracing the referendum idea.

From a purely technical, legal point of view, a referendum in Israel would have no effect. In Israel, as in Canada and other parliamentary systems of government, Parliament is sovereign and supreme and no other assembly, not even a direct vote of the people, can bind Parliament. Nevertheless, it is wrong to assert that a referendum undermines the legitimacy of Parliament and derogates from the principle of parliamentary sovereignty. The referendum would not change the system of government in Israel. It would simply be a process for taking the pulse of the nation and putting the weight of the people behind a controversial and significant step. It would help preserve the unity of the Israeli people in the face of a divisive issue.

The Supreme Court of Canada, in its landmark reference on Quebec's secession, has acknowledged that referendums, while not part of the constitutional order of Canada, can play a valuable role in democracy and do not conflict with or undermine any of the democratic institutions in a parliamentary system of government.

In the secession reference, the Court addressed the possibility of a future referendum in Quebec about seceding from Canada and stated: "Although the Constitution does not itself address the use of a referendum procedure, and the results of a referendum may have no direct role or legal effect in our constitutional scheme, a referendum undoubtedly may provide a democratic method of ascertaining the views of the electorate on important political questions on a particular occasion… Our political institutions are premised on the democratic principle, and so an expression of the democratic will of the people of the province carries weight…"

Israelis would be wise to heed the words of Canada's top court. Rather than undermining the system of democracy in Israel, a referendum would complement that very democracy. By giving the people a direct voice in one of its most fundamental decisions, a referendum would do much to enhance the legitimacy of Sharon's plan.

A referendum on the disengagement plan would also create a positive precedent (and not a dangerous one) that the people should be consulted when fundamental changes are proposed. In Canada, as in many other countries with enshrined constitutions, the procedures necessary to change the constitution and effect fundamental changes are known to be burdensome.

Although Israel does not yet have a constitution, the principal is equally valid: when an historic and fundamental change is contemplated, the process should involve a more concrete manifestation of the consensual and informed will of the people then a mere act of Parliament, which can be reversed by the whim of often unpredictable legislators. A referendum could be one such method.

We should be wary of confusing the means with the end – parliamentary sovereignty is not a good in and of itself. The Knesset is the instrument through which the Israeli people participate in democracy by exercising the right to vote and elect representatives. Parliament is sovereign because it represents the sovereignty of the people, not because it has some exalted status allowing it to overrule the people.

Living for the long haul

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

What's the dividing line between maturity and immaturity? As a child, this was always a mystery to me. I tried to intuit a definition of maturity from bits of grown-up conversation. It involved tucking in my shirt, sitting up straight and chewing with my mouth closed. (The truly mature also kept their elbows off the table.) Mature boys didn't cry, and weren't afraid of monsters in the basement. Maturity meant acting like the grownups.

As I grew older, I realized I needed a more mature definition of maturity. Maturity is not found in long pants or manners or even RRSPs, but rather in a perspective on life. Indeed, maturity is somewhat similar to the kabbalistic concept of gadlut. In gadlut, or "largeness," one stops focusing on the narrow obsessions that often dominate our waking moments. One transcends the perspective of pettiness and considers the big picture. True maturity is very similar: it is living life while looking beyond the here and now.

This type of maturity is not automatically bestowed with age. Even adults with tucked-in shirts can get trapped in the childish world of the here and now. Have you ever been stuck in an unexpected traffic jam when you are a few minutes late? If you're like me, you are completely unnerved by the situation, constantly thinking, "Come on, come on! I'm late, I'm late!" Even though there's nothing you can do about it, impatience leaves you distracted and distraught. Instead of taking advantage of the time to relax, you obsess over the stalled car in the right lane. This smallmindedness can be very destructive. The frustration from a one-hour traffic jam can poison your mood for an entire day.

Maturity is living life for the long haul. When you live for the long haul, your life is driven by a defining sense of purpose. Each moment, each event, is approached with that larger goal in mind. Small setbacks don't get in your way, and serious setbacks don't stop you either. All that matters is the larger goal of true purpose.

Most of us don't have a clear sense of purpose. Corporations spend endless hours and dollars working on mission statements, trying to understand what they should be doing. But rarely does anyone sit down and consider what his own mission ought to be. Because of our lack of mission, we end up living unfocused lives, distracted by temporary worries, without a larger sense of purpose to anchor us.

Living life for the long haul begins with a sense of purpose. True maturity is achieved when each moment is lived according to a larger ideal. This broader vision is life-transforming, and useful when stuck in traffic!

Withdrawing from land legitimately won

Gil Troy in Montreal

Even though it justifies my profession as a historian, I dislike George Santayana's 1905 teaching that "those who forget the past are condemned to repeat it." What about those moments worth remembering, when heroic predecessors averted disaster? These days, I fear those who forget the past – or distort it – risk making unprecedented mistakes.

As Israel emerges from the fog of war toward an equally murky search for peace, we must remember our history. Wherever you stand, whether you consider the territories "occupied," "liberated," or "disputed," whether you rejoice that settlers are leaving illegal settlements or mourn Jews uprooting Jewish communities in their homeland, no one can honestly overlook two essential historical truths. Israel is a democracy, providing many legitimate avenues for expression, making dissident violence unacceptable. Second, no matter what Israel should do with the territories, Israel acquired those territories legitimately.

These two lessons take us back to Israel's two defining wars, the 1948 War of Independence, and the 1967 Six Day War.

On May 14, 1948, when David Ben-Gurion, the first prime minister, proclaimed Israel's independence, he entered this new country into that select club of enlightened Western democracies, promising to "uphold the full social and political equality of all its citizens." Five weeks later, this fledgling democracy passed a crucial test when it averted civil war.

The SS Altalena carried approximately 940 fighters and 4,500 tons of desperately needed armaments purchased by the Irgun Tsvai Leumi, one of the underground militias the Israel Defence Forces expected to absorb. Historians still dispute just what occurred, but two facts are clear. First the IDF fired on the ship and sank it. Second, the Irgun's leader, Menachem Begin, who became Israel's prime minister in 1977, accepted Ben-Gurion's authority and did not rebel.

Half a century later, Begin's pain and anger still throb on the relevant pages of his memoir, The Revolt. But through the fury comes a clear message all Israelis must heed. Begin proclaimed: "In no circumstances will we use arms against our fellow Jews." Just as Ben-Gurion's government spoke imperfectly, heavy-handedly, possibly immorally, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government has spoken controversially but decisively. All citizens no matter how outraged must comply – and Israel's supporters must endorse the rule of law unequivocally.

Even while demanding peaceful protest, even while respecting the government's right to make difficult decisions, all must remember the second relevant history lesson, from 1967. Regardless of what Israel should have done with the territories – in 1967 or today – Israel acquired those territories legally, legitimately, reluctantly.

It is undisputed that for 19 years between the 1949 armistice and the 1967 war, Jordan controlled the West Bank and Gaza – without United Nations authorization. It is incontrovertible that in May 1967 Egypt blocked the Straits of Tiran and banished the UN troops serving as a buffer in the Sinai, thus violating international law and legally justifying Israel's pre-emptive airstrikes. It is irrefutable – and confirmed by the late King Hussein of Jordan himself – that even after the war began, Israel's then prime minister Levi Eshkol sent a special message via the UN intermediary Gen. Odd Bull, urging Jordan to remain peaceful – or suffer the consequences.

Thus, just as the United States defined its border with Mexico, as France defined its border with Germany, as India defined its border with Pakistan, Israel defined its borders, through a combination of justified – and in this case defensive – warfare and historical happenstance.

Right-wingers should honour democracy, which Ben-Gurion and Begin encoded into Israel's DNA, in accepting the government's decisions peacefully. Similarly, by honouring Israel's legitimate claim to the territories, left-wingers would acknowledge just how big a step the society is taking – withdrawing from land legitimately won builds more confidence in a nascent peace process than abandoning marginal territories. In so doing, lions will not lie down with lambs, and left and right will not hug and sing Kumbaya.

But if all partisans respect the centrality of Israel's democratic tradition as well as the complexity and courage of its current decision once again to be the only country in history to withdraw from disputed territory it won after entering a defensive war, perhaps we might defuse the toxicity that killed 16 Irgun fighters and three IDF soldiers in 1948. Then, we will be able to say that those who remember the past might be able to improve the future.

Women, math and science

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Perhaps it's because my father was a math teacher. To our shared delight, he began teaching me algebra in Grade 2, and soon moved on to geometry and trigonometry. In adolescence, I worked through books of math puzzles for the sheer fun of it. As an undergraduate, I oscillated between literature and math. Shakespeare or Euclid, Coleridge or Currant?

Or perhaps it's because I've known too many women who gave up prematurely on math and science – told that they didn't have what it takes, or that they'd soon abandon the field to raise families, or that no man would marry a geek.

The dismayed response of women scientists, mathematicians and engineers at Harvard University to their university president Lawrence Summers' recent musings about their fields struck a resonant chord for me. At a recent economics conference, Summers commented on the underrepresentation of women in these fields.

Summers suggested that the disproportionately low number of women at top-tier research institutions might be explained by three factors: women's reluctance to commit to a demanding work schedule during child-rearing years; an innate male advantage in these areas; and social conditioning that discourages women from pursuing career paths in these fields.

It was the second factor that drew fire. Summers was understood to be asserting that women are hard-wired to be deficient in math and science. Particularly because Summers diminished the impact of socialization, many of his faculty took offence. They saw his comments as belittling women researchers and discouraging women students.

Indeed, not that long ago, it was widely believed that women did not possess the innate ability to think logically and analytically. On this basis, women were underrepresented, if not barred outright, from such professions as law, medicine and accounting; on this basis, they were denied the right to vote. Despite the fact that women score higher than men in many standardized tests that measure verbal ability, for many years it was assumed that women could not write great literature.

These assumptions, even if false, have real ramifications on women's lives. Had William Shakespeare an equally gifted sister, Virginia Woolf once famously noted, social beliefs about the differing abilities and roles of men and women would have kept her from bringing her talent to fruition. Until recently, most women authors published under male pennames; talented women in all fields channelled their smarts unacknowledged into the works of husbands or brothers.

So I understand why professors across North America reacted in dismay to remarks that the Harvard president intended "as provocation," that is, to stimulate discussion. His comments took no account of the tendentious nature of gender-based research. Nor did they navigate the sensitivity of his faculty who may have struggled personally against social prescriptions about appropriate paths for women, or who may have sought but not found institutional support in carrying career and family responsibilities. I believe that Summers misspoke at the economics conference, not taking into account the charged complexities of gender research.

Still, the maelstrom that followed his remarks seem disproportionate to the raw nerves he scraped. After all, Summers was by no means suggesting that Harvard hiring policies or student acceptances ought to conform to any given idea about women's and men's innate abilities. Nothing in his administration of the university appears unfriendly to the advancement of women in all fields. Despite a subsequent open letter to Harvard faculty urging that the university "aggressively… encourage girls and women to pursue science at the highest levels," angry feelings against Summers continue to mount, so much so that his leadership seems on the line.

The battle is political, but it is not gender politics that lies at its heart. Summers has been a controversial president, attracting admirers and detractors with his penchant for a provocative and challenging style. While his views are left of centre, he is quick to break taboos and challenge unexamined pieties. Bold and outspoken, he has been one of the few university presidents in North America to openly decry an increase in anti-Semitic attitudes on campuses. He has resisted a movement to force Harvard to divest itself of investments in Israel. It is positions such as these, I believe – at odds with some contingents in his faculty – that fuel the rage at his comments about gender.

The Kirshner File

U.S. battles a revolt, builds democracy, in Iraq

As the second anniversary of the invasion of Iraq approaches, the United States and its allies – the so-called "coalition of the willing" – face a dilemma.

If they maintain the occupation, they may stiffen the resolve of anti-American insurgents to keep Iraq in a perpetual state of chaos. But if they withdraw hastily, they would reward the rebels with a victory, call into question the rationale for the invasion and, perhaps, precipitate a civil war pitting Iraq's majority Shiite Muslims against the Sunnis, the rulers of Iraq prior to and during the Saddam Hussein era.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Military planners in Washington and London knew perfectly well that an insurgency was possible after the war, but they did not seriously take that consideration into account. Nor, as Porter Goss – the director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency – has suggested, did strategists factor yet another unintended consequence of the war into the equation – namely that Iraq might replace Afghanistan as a training ground for the next generation of Al Qaeda terrorists. As he put it recently, "Islamic extremists are exploiting the Iraqi conflict to recruit new anti-U.S. jihadists."

And so, due to miscalculation and inadequate preparation, the United States – the world's sole superpower – finds itself mired in a classic guerrilla war that has already claimed the lives of almost 1,500 Americans since the launch of the invasion on March 19, 2003.

Some analysts have warned that the insurgency – spearheaded by a loose alliance of former Baathist regime officials, disgruntled Sunnis resentful of their loss of control and a rainbow of Islamic radicals who pine for a theocracy in Iraq – could last for a decade, if not longer.

Although the situation on the ground looks bleak and unforgiving, the Bush administration has devised a plausible exit strategy that turns on bringing democracy to Iraq, reconstructing the country's shattered infrastructure and training an indigenous Iraqi force to take over security duties. If these objectives can be achieved, the Americans will be able to extricate themselves from the morass in Iraq and bask in the glow of a job well done.

But the task of implanting democracy in a nation inured to despotism will not be easy. Before the dictatorial Baathists appeared on the scene in the early 1960s, Iraq was under the sway of a feckless monarchy largely unconcerned with furthering the interests of the masses. But now that the first free election in decades has taken place in Iraq, Iraqis have a real chance to build a democratic system that could yet revolutionize the country and set an example for the rest of the authoritarian Arab world.

On election day on Jan. 30, the insurgents launched a succession of attacks that resulted in the deaths of more than 40 Iraqis. Nevertheless, 58 per cent of eligible voters cast their ballots, courageously defying death threats and other forms of intimidation. Not surprisingly, the Shiites, comprising nearly two-thirds of Iraq's population, were the big winners. They won 48 per cent of the seats in the new National Assembly, whose mandate will be to draft a new constitution. The Kurds won almost 26 per cent of the seats, and a bloc headed by the interim prime minister, Iyad Allawi, a secular Sunni, amassed around 14 per cent. Allawi is expected to be replaced by Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a Shiite medical doctor from the Islamic-oriented Dawa party who spent years in exile.

Much to the regret of the Americans, most Sunnis boycotted the election, prompting leading Sunni clerics to proclaim it lacked legitimacy. The Sunnis stayed away in droves for three reasons. It was a foregone conclusion that the Shiites would emerge triumphant. Influential Sunni organizations, such as the Association of Muslim Scholars, decreed that an election under an occupation would be illegitimate. And, of course, Sunnis were intimidated by the insurgents. In Sunni-dominated provinces where the insurgency is strongest, such as Anbar and Nineveh, negligible numbers of voters turned out.

The Sunni boycott means that Shiite and Kurdish political parties will be overrepresented in the next government, a further cause for Sunni alienation and support of the insurgency. But the winners, realizing that magnanimity in victory is the wisest course, intend to reach out to Sunnis and include their elected and non-elected representatives in the cabinet and government. Whether that defuses resentment in the Sunni community remains to be seen.

Another imponderable concerns the place of Islam in the government. The spiritual leader of Iraqi Shiites, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, who insisted on an early election in the teeth of Sunni resistance, has demanded that Islam should be the sole source of all future legislation. But most Shiite politicians apparently oppose Sistani's hardline position.

The emergence of an Iranian-style theocracy in Iraq would certainly be Washington's – and Israel's – worst nightmare. The Bush administration, however, is sanguine that Iraqis will opt for either a secular government or a mildly Islamic government similar to that of Turkey.

Ghazi al-Yawer

Nevertheless, Iraqi politicians have their work cut out for them. Once the positions of president and prime minister have been filled, the 275-member National Assembly will be called on to draft a permanent constitution. Then, in an October referendum, voters will be asked to pass judgment on the constitution. If it is accepted, Iraqis will vote for a new government. If it is rejected, the whole process will have to be repeated.

Whatever happens politically, Iraq still faces the awesome challenge of putting its house in order in terms of reconstruction. Unemployment runs high, gasoline lines stretch endlessly and brownouts are quite common.

The first Gulf War, in 1991, left Iraq in shambles, as U.S. and allied aircraft bombed vital installations ranging from power stations and bridges to electrical grids and water treatment plants. Subsequent United Nations economic sanctions exacted a further toll, while the 2003 invasion exacerbated an already frightful situation. The United States has poured billions of dollars into rebuilding the country, but insurgents keep attacking new public works projects and oil and gas pipelines, the lifeblood of Iraq's economy.

Washington's foremost objective, apart from defeating the insurgency, is to train and equip a reliable national police force and army, all with European and Canadian assistance. This will permit the United States to reduce troop levels drastically. But the problem is that such a force may not be combat-ready for years to come. So far, in any case, the performance of Iraqi fighters has been extremely uneven and disappointing. In past battles, entire units fled, and according to U.S. Deputy Defence Secretary Paul Wolfowitz, absentee rates of 40 per cent have been recorded. Skeptics claim the United States is training a latter-day South Vietnamese army, which could never hold its own against the victorious Viet Cong or the North Vietnamese army.

Given the generally low regard in which Iraqi forces are currently held, the United States will not be able to withdraw its 150,000 troops any time soon. For what it's worth, Lieut.-Gen. James Lovelace, deputy chief of staff responsible for operations, said recently that about 120,000 U.S. soldiers will be required in Iraq at least until the end of 2006.

Asked last month whether the presence of foreign troops is fuelling the insurgency, Ghazi al-Yawer, the current president of Iraq, replied, "It's complete nonsense to ask the troops to leave in this chaos and this vacuum of power." His comments speak to a stubborn and increasingly sophisticated insurgency whose broad purpose is to destabilize an already tottering nation, render it insecure, sow sectarian violence and destroy the prospects of a free, democratic Iraq.

The rebellion, centred in the Sunni Triangle in and around Baghdad and purportedly aided and abetted by Syria and perhaps Iran, has had a devastating impact on the country. In recent months, the rebels have carried out upward of 400 to 600 attacks per week on coalition and Iraqi forces, ordinary Iraqis and Iraq's infrastructure.

The Americans and their allies have counter-attacked with reasonably satisfactory results. An uprising in Najaf last summer, led by Moktada al-Sadr, a radical Shiite cleric, was subdued. And last November, in three weeks of fierce fighting, a rebellion in Falluja was ruthlessly crushed. But most of the insurgents holed up in Falluja, including the notorious Jordanian militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, managed to escape to fight another day. Since then, minor uprisings have erupted in such cities as Mosul and Ramadi. Baghdad, the capital, is still not under complete U.S. control, and the kidnapping and beheading of foreigners remain dire threats.

In short, Iraq is far from pacified.

Int'l conference to address domestic abuse

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The second international conference on domestic abuse in the Jewish community, presented by Jewish Women International (JWI), is set for March 20 to 23 in Washington, D.C.

The conference, "Pursuing Truth, Justice and Righteousness: A Call to Action," will bring together about 700 people from around the world, including domestic abuse advocates, survivors of abuse, social workers, clergy, researchers and volunteers, who will all share experiences, explore new resources, and network.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWI Canada and a member of the conference planning committee, said the first conference, held in July 2003, attracted people from every continent.

"To sit in the room with [hundreds] of people who recognized that domestic abuse occurs in the Jewish community [was overwhelming.]

"There are still many professionals who do not realize that there is abuse in Jewish families. The issue is still not high on the agenda in the Jewish world."

On the positive side, however, rabbis are becoming more sensitive to the issue – in the United States they have developed a clergy task force – and there is more information in the media, she said.

"We only read about the most violent events, though. Abuse has many forms, and most of it is psychological. That [often] occurs long before the physical abuse begins."

Last fall, JWI set up a task force to try to transform the Jewish community's knowledge and response to domestic abuse, to ensure the safety, security and dignity of women and children, said Krowitz.

"People need to understand that although there are many government and community programs in place, social change has not taken place, and attitudes have not changed enough."

Through events such as the conference, they would like to build a global movement to engage the community around the issue. "We want to involve as many people in as many walks of life as possible, and collaborate and share personal experiences, she said.

The conference will include about 60 workshops, as well as special skill-building sessions that will target clergy, mikvah attendants, direct service providers and social workers.

Keynote lectures will address such topics as children who witness violence, issues surrounding dating relationships and engaging Jewish men in the issue.

Immediately prior to the conference, JWI will host a retreat for college students and young professionals to examine dating, sex and communication in the context of healthy and unhealthy relationships. Those interested can call Rachel Keller, 1-800-343-2823 or e-mail rkeller@jwi.org.

For information on the conference call 1-800-343-2823 or visit www.jwicalltoaction.org.

Two promising cases: Zuroff

Collaboration in the Baltics was extensive and helped account for the high death tolls of local Jewish populations. In Lithuania, 212,000 out of 220,000 Jews were murdered; in Latvia, 67,000 out of 70,000; and in Estonia, 993 of 1,000 were killed, he said.

In addition, Jews from other parts of Europe were brought to these countries to be killed, and later in the war, many Nazi collaborators were part of armed units sent to other parts of the Soviet Union to murder Jews.

Pressed by the United States, Israel and other countries, Lithuania indicted two suspects, but they were so frail they were declared medically unfit for trial. The Lithuanian government hoped that "trick" would relieve the pressure, but it instead prompted creation of Operation: Last Chance, along with its requirement that the reward is contingent on conviction and punishment, Zuroff said.

Since it was inaugurated in July 2002, Operation: Last Chance has generated two cases that appear "very promising," Zuroff said.

In Croatia, Milivoj Asner, the former wartime police chief of Slavonia Pozega, is under investigation after the country's president personally urged the attorney general to proceed. Asner fled to Klagenfurt, Austria in July 2004 after his wartime role was exposed.

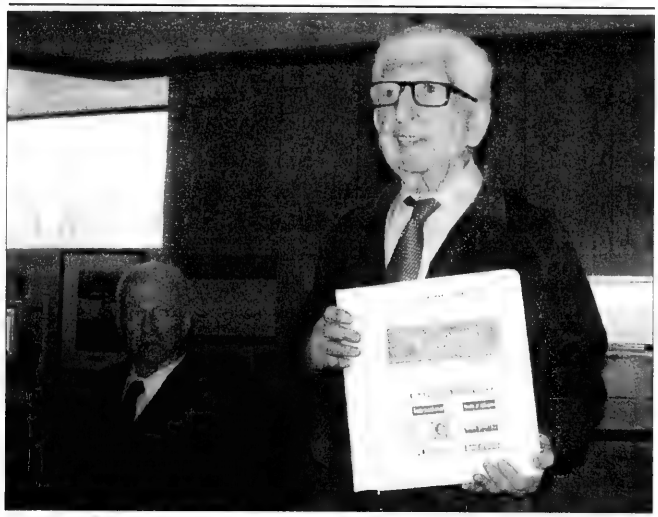
In Hungary, a former army officer is under investigation for murdering a young Budapest Jew in 1944 for not wearing a yellow star. Charles Zentai is now believed to be living in Perth, Australia, Zuroff said.

Turning to the Canadian scene, Zuroff said he was shocked at the lack of progress on the Nazi war crimes file.

"What's going on here is just unbelievable," he said. Only three new cases have been launched in Canada in the last two years (21 since 1994) while the United States has stripped 74 suspects of citizenship and deported 54 in the last four years.

"It's a total failure of political will to finish off these cases in the manner they should be. It's an across-the-board failure. To me it's clear these cases are in bad need of strong political will, to complete them and deny them the privilege of living in Canada."

He suggested the local Jewish community, preoccupied with issues of anti-Semitism and Israel-bashing, have not pushed hard for action on the war crimes dossier.



LIBRARY DONATION: Irving Naftolin, 91, recently donated eight binders containing clippings from The CJN to the Jewish Public Library. Since 1997, Naftolin, a retired printer, has spent thousands of hours compiling the 150-to-200 page binders, which will be available to library visitors. Naftolin also donated six binders of clippings from B'nai Brith Canada's newspaper The Jewish Tribune. [Carolyn Blackman photo]

Jewish day school lobby to hire executive director

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

The Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS) plans to hire an executive director to lobby the provincial and federal governments for funding.

Last week, OAJDS co-presidents Aaron Blumenfeld and Ira Walfish discussed some of the association's ongoing projects since the private school tax credits introduced by the Ontario Progressive Conservative government in 2002 were repealed by the Liberal government the following year.

They were addressing a group of 50 parents at a public meeting organized jointly by OAJDS and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy public affairs committee (CIJA-PAC).

While OAJDS plans to continue working with Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, it is important to have an organization that deals only with this issue, Walfish said in an interview.

"We want to keep this issue high on the agenda," he said.

Blumenfeld also discussed the possibility of initiating a lawsuit against the province, based on its revoking the tax credits. There is a question of whether a right given to a group can be taken away, he said at the meeting.

The OAJDS collects $100,000 annually from Jewish day school parents through a $10 per child levy. Besides hiring an executive director, the organization already has an office and secretary.

Blumenfeld, a lawyer, and Walfish, an accountant, said much of their advocacy work is done behind the scenes. However, they added that since the funding issue is taking up more of their time, there is now a need for a paid employee who will focus all his or her attention on this issue.

Although they said that every organization has something positive to contribute to this issue, they believe OAJDS can best represent the community because it speaks for all the schools – those that are affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education and those that aren't.

At the meeting, Walfish discussed some of the differences in lobbying the provincial Liberals as compared to the former Progressive Conservative government. For example, he said the Liberal government is more concerned with issues such as teacher certification, accountability and ensuring that the schools conform to the Ontario curriculum.

According to Walfish, the OAJDS has managed to get schools from across the religious spectrum, from Reform to haredi, to sit together and address issues of accountability and conforming to Ministry of Education standards, even though that would mean integrating aspects of the public school curriculum into some of the school's programs.

Right now, some schools are so busy with Torah study that they don't have time to fit in all the provincial requirements, Walfish said.

The idea of refocusing attention on the 1999 United Nations Human Rights Committee ruling that found Canada in violation of its international obligations was also discussed at the meeting. In the Waldman case, the UN found that Ontario discriminated against other faiths by funding only Roman Catholic schools.

If the federal Liberal government is as concerned with minority rights as they claim to be in the same-sex marriage issue, they should also be insisting that this inequity be addressed, Walfish said.

At this point, Walfish said, OAJDS has a core group of committed parents who are working towards effectively communicating some fair funding issues. Their key communication points include conveying the message that "discrimination on the basis of religious beliefs is not acceptable in a modern democracy" and that "the survival of the Jewish community depends on broad access to Jewish day schools."

There are also parents who want to work towards getting some of the major donors in our community to see that this is an important issue, Walfish said.

Josh Cooper, managing director of CIJA-PAC, said that, unfortunately, he could not attend the meeting but that he sent a sheet outlining tips for dealing with grassroots advocacy.

Seminar to examine concerns of observant women

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

An all-day seminar at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation will deal with issues of women's health, such as menopause and reproduction, as well as special issues affecting the religiously observant woman.

The seminar, sponsored by Canadian Friends of Nishmat in conjunction with the Golda Koschitzky Center at Nishmat, Emunah Women of Toronto, Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women and Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, will be held on March 13. It will run from 9:30 until 3:45.

Among the subjects to be covered are childbirth, contraception, menopause, nutrition, cancer, mikvah and infertility. Torontonians Susan Zehavi, a practitioner of traditional Chinese and various alternative therapies, and Maya Zimmerman-Litman, a Feldenkrais practitioner, will give a seminar on the relationship of body, mind and spirit.

Other Torontonians taking part are life coach Erika Engel, family physician Esther Libman, dietician Susan Osher, Heather Shapiro, a physician in reproductive endocrinology and infertility, teachers Ilana Sober and Rifka Sonenberg, and oncologist Judith Weinroth.

The event will also feature several women with a unique title – yoatzot halacha.

These are women, trained at Nishmat Jerusalem Centre for Advanced Jewish Study for Women, in halachic sources and modern medicine, and so able and qualified to assist other women with personal halachic questions. Many women are hesitant or embarrassed to speak to male rabbis on matters of family purity, sexual issues or gynecologic concerns. Yoatzot halacha have studied intensively for two years a curriculum of talmudic and halachic sources on family purity laws and issues, as well as a co-curriculum in modern medicine and psychology.

Most of these women practise in Israel, although there are a few in North America.

The program was founded by Rabbanit Chana Henkin, founder and dean of Nishmat. She has created many opportunities for women to engage in advanced Torah learning. Rabbanit Henkin has taught in Toronto several times, and will be taking part in the seminar day.

One of the main speakers is pediatrician Deena Zimmerman, one of the first yoatzot halacha. She has written and lectured widely on medicine, women's health and Jewish law. She is medical adviser to Nishmat's Golda Koschitzky Women's Halachic Hotline and directs Nishmat's taharat hamishpachah (family purity) websites.

Her recent book, A Lifetime Companion to the Laws of Jewish Family Life, emphasizes the interplay between Jewish law and women's health issues. She now lives in Israel.

Another yoetzet halacha taking part is Nomi Englard-Shaffer, a PhD candidate in Talmud at Bar Ilan University and a member of the staff of Nishmat's Golda Koschitzky Women's Halachic Hotline.

Cost of the all-day program, including lunch, is $36 per person in advance, or $45 at the door.

For more information, or to reserve, contact Canadian Friends of Nishmat, 44 Dell Park Ave., Toronto, M6B 2T6, telephone 416-789-4883.

Prospects slim for Israeli-Syria peace, expert says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Prospects for a rapprochement between Israel and Syria are quite remote, an Israeli Mideast specialist says.

"The chances for an accommodation are very slim," Moshe Maoz, a Hebrew University professor emeritus, told journalists last week in a conference call briefing them about the current situation in the region.

The reasons are twofold, he explained.

First, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is averse to conducting peace talks with Syria while engaged in negotiations with the Palestinians. "He doesn't want to juggle two sets of talks."

Second, Sharon does not want to dismantle settlements on the Golan Heights, which Israel seized in the 1967 Six Day War.

Maoz, currently at the U.S. Institute for Peace in Washington, D.C., said surveys reveal 70 per cent of Israelis agree with Sharon on this point.

Nonetheless, there is a great deal of debate in Israel on whether Israel should reopen talks with Syria, he noted.

The outgoing chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Yaalon, and the president of Israel, Moshe Katsav, have both come out in favour of restarting negotiations.

But Sharon has imposed a set of conditions for Syria to meet before the resumption of negotiations, which broke down five years ago.

The conditions are that Syria would have to close the offices of terrorist groups on its territory, stop acts of aggression against Israel by Hezbollah, end its occupation of Lebanon and permit Lebanese forces to take control of the border with Israel.

Turning to a related topic, Maoz said Syria is unlikely to withdraw its 14,000 troops from Lebanon unless it reaches a peace agreement with Israel.

According to Maoz, Syria regards Lebanon as a great asset. The Syrian economy is dependent on the remittances of one million Syrian workers in Lebanon, the Lebanese banking system and the port of Beirut.

And the Syrian government, which considers Lebanon a part of greater Syria, regards Lebanon as a useful buffer zone with Israel.

Maoz, the author of several books on Syria, suggested Syria's military presence in Lebanon is "legitimate" and "kosher," and based on several factors.

The Arab League in 1976 invited Syria to quell the second civil war in Lebanon. The Syrians failed to pacify the country, but never left.

Under the 1989 Taif accord ending the protracted war, Syrian forces were required to redeploy to the Bekaa Valley, adjacent to Syria. But Syria continued to station troops throughout Lebanon.

Syria's 1991 friendship treaty with the pro-Syrian Lebanese government also legitimized its occupation of Lebanon.

Lately, though, Syria has been under intense pressure to vacate Lebanon, he added.

Last year, the United Nations passed a resolution demanding Syria's withdrawal. And since the Feb. 14 assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister, opposition political parties in Lebanon have issued an identical demand. Maoz said many Lebanese suspect Syria masterminded Hariri's murder.

While branding Syria's role in Lebanon as "a brutal occupation," Maoz suggested some Israeli decision-makers think it serves Israel's interests.

Giora Eiland, a former general and now head of the Israeli National Security Council, claimed only Syria can neutralize Hezbollah, while Ehud Barak, the former prime minister, adopted a similar view.

Switching gears, Maoz said Sharon's decision to give up the Gaza Strip stems from his belief that Israel cannot remain a Jewish state while occupying more than one million Palestinian Arabs.

"Israel has to separate from the Palestinians. Who wants Gaza? It's a poor, miserable place."

Maoz, who has known Sharon for years, described him as a strategist rather than an ideologue.

A stable, prosperous Palestinian state is in the interests of both sides, he said. But the question now is what kind of a state Sharon will tolerate.

There will be problems if Sharon decides to annex 20 per cent or 30 per cent of the West Bank, he warned. Neither the Palestinians nor the Muslim world would accept this.

The vast majority of Palestinians support the current peace process. "They are fed up with the intifadah, which has brought them misery."

Mahmud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, appears to be a weak figure, Maoz said. His successor could be Marwan Barghouti, currently serving a life sentence in an Israeli prison. Maoz said the United States needs a resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict to improve its image in Iraq and the Arab world.

Jewish Life

Tzedakah and pride

By RABBI EDWARD ELKIN

It's every fundraiser's fantasy: the building fund overflows! Morning after morning, the Israelites brought their freewill gifts of gold and silver and copper and yarns and skins and oil and spices and gems, according to parshat Vayakhel's description of the collection of terumah – gifts for the building of the wilderness sanctuary. They brought so much, in fact, that the sanctuary artisans couldn't use it all. So Moses proclaimed a halt to this sanctuary building fund, and the giving ceased.

Many commentators use this story as an opportunity to reflect on the motivation of the Israelites and the nature of giving in general. Rabbi David Shoham notes that the children of Israel would bring their gifts at dawn, when the light was so weak that people couldn't see very well. Why then? Because the darkness would obscure their identity, and they could be sure that they wouldn't receive honour and recognition from their fellows – only God would know they had given.

The Sefat Emet and others take an opposite view of the Israelites' motivation. In this view, the real reason for Moses' halt to giving was that personal motives had crept into the people's giving. Pride had become the overriding factor. As described in the commentary Sihot Tzadikim, each person would say, "I am the one who completed the sanctuary; without my contribution it would have been impossible for the sanctuary to be built." Giving became a competition. And because God's presence would only dwell in the sanctuary if it were built out of the purest motivation, the giving had to stop.

In our own time, people's motivations for giving can also be seen in different ways. Some credit individuals in our community with only the purest and most altruistic of motives for giving. Others say self-aggrandizement and pride taint communal fundraising efforts.

Interestingly, the Torah itself sometimes sanctions public proclamations of giving. Every third year, farmers were supposed to give one-tenth of their yield to the needy. This tithe was to be accompanied by a public declaration attesting to the fact the farmer had fulfilled his obligation: "I have cleared out the consecrated portion from the house, and I have given it to the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless and the widow" (Deuteronomy 26:13). In this very different context, giving was not supposed to be anonymous at all.

What is the difference between giving to build the sanctuary and the farmers' tithe? The gifts for the sanctuary were brought voluntarily. In contrast, the tithe was obligatory for every Israelite farmer. The needy should never depend on the goodwill of others for basic sustenance. The poor need to eat, whether or not others feel like giving. The public proclamation may in fact encourage others to meet their obligations to the needy as well.

Perhaps herein lies the reason for the concern about anonymous giving for the sanctuary and the lack of concern with regard to the tithe. When people give out of their own free will, there is a much greater danger that they will feel pride in their gift, which might distort the purity of their giving. When one gives out of obligation, there is no pride. In our own time, for example, no one feels "proud" of paying taxes – it's just something we all have to do.

When we give tzedakah today, is it obligation or free will? It contains elements of both. Keeping both elements in balance, we strive to do right by all the worthy causes we support, without letting our own pride become the driving force behind our tzedakah. The natural human craving for the esteem of our neighbours is a quality we must recognize in ourselves, and strive to keep in check when appropriate.

Reclaiming Maimonides

By RABBI AMRAM ASSAYAG

Guest Voice

It only lasted three days, but took 800 years to happen. From Oct. 12 to 14, Sephardi Jewry witnessed the circularity of Jewish history and its ultimate justice.

More than 60 of the world's most distinguished rabbis gathered in Cordoba, Spain, to commemorate the 800th anniversary of the death of the Rambam, Moses ben Maimon (Maimonides). He was the greatest mind in Jewish history, revered by learned Christians and Muslims alike, and of whom it is said, "from Moses to Moses, there is none other."

For generations, Spanish scholars have embraced the Rambam's contributions to philosophy and medicine, and revered the place and date of his birth, Cordoba 1138. This event gave all of Spain an opportunity to learn about the Rambam's Jewish roots and his vast contributions to Jewish thought.

World Jewry – represented by the two chief rabbis of Israel, members of the rabbinical council of the Chief Rabbinate, judges of the Rabbinical Court of Appeals, selected rabbis of the Diaspora and myself as sole Canadian representative – highlighted the Rambam as a Jew and his contributions to Judaism.

Rabbi Shlomo Amar, the chief Sephardi rabbi of Israel, conceived the idea to commemorate Maimonides while visiting Cordoba in May 2003. The city's mayor welcomed the idea with enthusiasm and planning began immediately.

Throughout this voyage "back home" to a place and time both magnificent and devastating, the rabbis were intensely aware of the hand of Hashem as ironies unfolded before their eyes and feelings of familiarity and spiritual comfort filled their hearts.

On the first day, the rabbis visited the famous Toledo Synagogue in Cordoba, known as El Transito, which is now a tourist site. For more than 500 years, no one had prayed inside this magnificent edifice, and the rabbis assumed that they would pray Minchah in the adjacent garden. Not so. The doors were opened wide, allowing them to pray inside and infuse every corner with a long-forgotten kedushah. That evening, the Jewish community held an inaugural dinner for the rabbis at Madrid's Palace Hotel.

The second day included an elegant reception in Seville hosted by the premier of Andalusia. The official ceremony to celebrate "The Commemoration of The 800th Anniversary of the Death of the Rambam" was held in Cordoba at el Alcazar de los Reyes Cristianos (the Palace of the Christian Kings), an irony that did not go unnoticed. Those in attendance included the Duke and Duchess of Palma (Princess Cristina and her husband) and Spain's foreign minister.

That evening in the palace's beautiful garden, another reception was held in the rabbi's honour, and renowned paytanim Rabbi Haim Louk and Rabbi Shemuel Toledano performed sacred Sephardi music.

A Jewish family in Madrid, wanting to share in this momentous occasion, dedicated a Sefer Torah to the Rambam Synagogue in Cordoba, and this great mitzvah was accompanied by a Hachanasat Sefer Torah. To partake in such a joyful simchah in Toronto is wonderful, but to proudly march, Sefer Torah in hand, through the streets of a country that banished all its Jews more than 500 years ago is awe-inspiring.

The third day was devoted to intensive study of the Rambam's Jewish thought, covering every aspect of Jewish life. Ten prominent rabbis delivered stimulating dissertations on aspects of his timeless contributions. The chochmah and kedushah that filled the room was palpable.

Throughout these three days, streets were blocked and police escorts were everywhere. People in Cordoba quickly realized that these strange-looking Jews were travelling around their city. For those who had never seen a rabbi – or even a Jew – to be confronted with 60 at one time must have seemed like a page of National Geographic come to life. Not since the 15th century, the time of the Jews' expulsion from Spain, has such a group of illustrious rabbis walked on Spanish ground.

The three days concluded with several promises from the Spanish government, including the establishment of a Holocaust Remembrance Day in Spain, a Maimonides Museum in Cordoba and a Sefarad House in Madrid.

For the people of Spain, this event was an opportunity to experience living Judaism and see the splendour of our tradition. For the rabbis, it was an opportunity to connect with Maimonides, to bond with each other through learning, and to touch a glorious era that is gone forever. Three days in Jewish history – with such profound, far-reaching effects.

Rabbi Assayag is chief rabbi of the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario.

The hidden faces of Purim

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

This year we have two months of Adar in the Hebrew calendar. Ordinarily, people associate Adar with Purim, which does not occur until Adar II. The extra month affords us the opportunity to prepare our thoughts with an eye toward the upcoming holiday.

Besides Mordechai and Esther, there is another important leader who is strongly linked to the month of Adar: Moses, who was born in Adar and died on the same day he was born. Interestingly, there are many points of comparison between Esther and Moses.

The rabbis of the Talmud spoke at great length about the theme of "hidden reality" in the Purim Scroll. Esther hides her identity as a Jew; Mordechai hides his relationship with Esther; God hides Divine intervention from the observer. The people in the Purim story are continuously dealing with the dual level of appearance and concealment.

Likewise, there is a strong element of Divine concealment in a personal moment shared with us in the text when Moses asks to see God's face. His request is declined. In what is likely the only time that God refuses a request from Moses, the Divine Face remains hidden. Moses' encounters with God have been visual from the start, so the request is consistent with the relationship. God must deny this request, stating that a human being cannot see the Divine and continue to live.

In other words, in viewing God with our eyes, we would cross a line that would take us out of the realm of humanity. Yet God's love for Moses does not allow God to dismiss the request entirely. God compromises by covering Moses' eyes, passing the Divine Presence over Moses' face and then uncovering his eyes, allowing Moses to see only God's back. God has accommodated Moses as best as possible while preserving Moses' humanity.

Yet even this compromise has repercussions, for the text relates that after Moses returns to the people, his face is emanating light to such a degree that no one could bear to sit in his presence. Moses must now hide his face behind a veil when speaking to other people. By even remotely accommodating Moses' request to see God's face, Moses can never again speak face-to-face with another human being. The mere glimpse of an encounter with God results in a separation of Moses from all people for all time. Moses asks to see what must remain hidden and must from then on hide his own face from those around him.

In the Purim story, Mordechai asks Esther to approach the king and plead for her people. Esther refuses, and Mordechai suggests to her that perhaps she has been made queen solely for this moment. Perhaps her life's destiny culminates in this opportunity to save her people. The question is never answered – the truth of her destiny remains hidden from us. Purim opens the door to a world of hidden truths. Moses shows us that what is hidden far surpasses what can be sought. Somewhere between Esther and Moses, we must all find our place.

New Daf Yomi cycle begins

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The cycle has begun again. The cycle is known as Daf Yomi, in which one page of the Talmud is studied daily until this classic work is completed in 7½ years. Whether you are a beginner and want to learn more about the Talmud or an advanced student looking for online resources, read on.

Orienting yourself to a page of Talmud can be quite daunting. To get a taste of the dynamics of a page, I highly recommend Eliezer Segal's beautifully constructed work. Segal has reproduced a typical page of the Talmud, this one from the tractate of Megillah. When you click on the text, you can get an excellent insight into the structure of the page and the annotation, which is indispensable to its understanding. [http://tinyurl.com/6ggo5]

Part of the Talmud learning experience is grasping the large volume in your hands while learning along with your teacher. Although there is no online substitute, you can read the entire contents of the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds on your computer screen. Please note that these pages are not set up in the standard format, nor do they include the classical commentators such as Rashi and Tosafot. [http://kodesh.snunit.k12.il/]

The so-called Easy Talmud Bavli has Rashi's commentary interspersed within the text of the Talmud. [www.geocities.com/Athens/Atrium/5242/] And E-daf displays a picture of the standard page of Talmud that can also be printed. (It also has an audio feature that I could not get to work.) [www.e-daf.com]

If you have difficulty getting your current browser to display in Hebrew, I recommend downloading the free Firefox browser, which seems to be more Hebrew-friendly. [www.mozilla.org/products/firefox/]

As for the Talmud teacher, if you happened to miss a lesson or need to catch up, there is help online. You can listen to Daf Yomi classes in English led by Rabbi Grossman at TeachItToMe.com. (I particularly liked the note at the bottom of the page that reads, "Distribution and copying of materials is HIGHLY ENCOURAGED…") [http://tinyurl.com/5t2t2] And if you prefer to learn in Yiddish, then take a listen to the late HaRav Avrohom Karp of the Lubavitch shul in Montreal. Rabbi Karp gave classes in Daf Yomi for close to 30 years and was recorded from 1969 to 1975. [www.kolavrohom.com/]

Most of the Daf Yomi commentary found on the Internet is in English, but you can find some resources in Hebrew. The Dafyomi Advancement Forum (DAF) has notes and commentaries from both the Yosef Da'as and the Galei Masechata. [www.dafyomi.co.il/ivrit2.htm] For more Daf Yomi sites, see DAF's Dafyomi Central Headquarters. [www.dafyomi.co.il/central.htm]

Two significant publishing initiatives that have make the Talmud more accessible are translations and elucidations by Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz [http://tinyurl.com/5zzz8] and by Artscroll Publishers. Artscroll recently celebrated the completion of its 35,000 page, 72-volume translation with a presentation of a set to the Library of Congress. I was fascinated by a Jerusalem Post article that explains the care and meticulous editing process that went into the creation of each Artscroll volume. [http://tinyurl.com/678s4]

I began this column by pointing out Eliezer Segal's excellent Page of Talmud site. Not surprisingly, Segal has completed studying all 2,711 pages of the Talmud and has written a column about his undertaking. Since his studies took several years and followed him around the world, I was fascinated that Segal now associates particular sections of the Talmud with the milestones of his own life: [http://tinyurl.com/5nw7x]

"One tractate conjures up associations with the Shiite village in Lebanon, where I studied it during my Israeli army reserve duty; another page I plodded through while waiting in a queue at Disneyland; still another I read just before my first job interview at the University of Calgary. I imagine that these personal associations will be forever attached to their respective sugyas (topics)."

By the way, the next time you're standing in line at Disneyland and have forgotten what page to study for that day's Daf Yomi, no problem. Just take out your Palm Pilot, run the Yomilator Program and you'll never go wrong. [http://bobnewell.net/yomi.zip] Better still, download a tractate onto your Palm and take same Talmud with you wherever you go. [www.jewishcontent.org]

Vancouver federation marks its 18th year

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) recently marked its 18th year.

The landmark was celebrated at federation's annual general meeting, which was held Feb. 17 in the Wosk Auditorium of the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver. The theme of the AGM, which was attended by approximately 100 members of the Lower Mainland Jewish community, was "18 Years Strong."

A new slate of officers was elected to take office in June. Elected for one-year terms were: Bernard Pinsky, president; Ron Rozen, vice-president for allocations; Diane Switzer, vice-president for leadership development; Mitchell Gropper, vice-president for finance resource development; Jack Altman, vice-president for planning and community development; Michael Fugman, treasurer; Shelley Ail, secretary, and Craig Diamond and Janice Loomer Margolis, members at large.

Ex officio members of the executive committee are: Arnie Fine, immediate past president; Jeffrey Goldberg, general campaign chair; Bev Libin, women's campaign chair, and Gerry Zlotnik, Jewish Community Foundation chair.

The meeting acknowledged federation past presidents, who are: Robert Coleman, 1987-89; Daniel Pekarsky, 1989-91; Ted Zacks, 1991-93; Peter Oreck, 1993-95; Malcolm Weinstein, 1995-97; Jonathan Berkowitz, 1997-99; Bob Willmot, 1999-2001; Sondra Green, 2001-03, and Arnie Fine, 2003-05.

In an interview with The CJN, Malcolm Weinstein said the federation had accomplished a lot in its first 18 years and is still working hard to establish its credibility.

"Much still needs to be done," he added. "We need to connect [the Combined Jewish Appeal] campaign in people's minds with the services it finances – how money and deeds go together."

He said the focus of the JFGV in the future should be the planning and provisioning of services for the Jewish poor, housing for the elderly, support for Israel, the new Jewish high school, people with disabilities and the increasing dispersion of Jews across the Lower Mainland.

Pinsky said the position is the most appropriate one in the community from which to lead. "Federation touches the most lives and has the most relevance across the board," he added

Pinsky, who has been involved in federation and many other Jewish organizations, including Canadian Jewish Congress, United Israel Appeal and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, said his goal is to make federation more visible and more accessible.

"I want people to think of federation as the community's central address. Federation should have a presence in all Jewish organizations and institutions in the Lower Mainland. I want our federation to become the model for other federations in North America to follow.'

Two longtime volunteers were recognized for their services to the community. Lana Pulver received JFGV's annual Young Leadership Award. Several years ago, Pulver helped transform federation's Super Sunday into Family Affair, a one-day family festival that has become a cornerstone of the annual Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign in the Lower Mainland.

Pulver serves on both the federation and Jewish Community Foundation boards, chairs the foundation's development committee and is involved in Vancouver Talmud Torah.

Bill Levine was awarded the Arthur Fouks Award for Distinguished Service, which recognizes individuals for outstanding leadership to both federation and CJA. As major gifts chair for the 2003 campaign, Levine helped to create and execute the strategy that led to a $1 million increase in donations. Levine also chaired the board of the Jewish Community Foundation for 4½ years.

JEWISH BRACELETS: Hundreds of students have snapped up bright green "Live Jewish" bracelets that are available from the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) office. The bracelets give Jewish teens another way to remember that being Jewish is cool, says Rabbi Binyamin Pinkus, director of senior NCSY. The Jewish version of the Lance Armstrong Live Strong bracelets, whose sales go toward finding a cure for cancer, has also been popular with teens in the United States. Proceeds from the NCSY bracelets are earmarked for Jewish education programs. Seen, from left, are NCSY members Josh Adler, Nicole Betel, Hartlee Zucker and Danya Borenstein.

Only paid Mazel tov announcements can be guaranteed to appear in a specific issue, when received by deadline, 10 days prior to publication date. All other items will appear on a first come, first served basis as space allows.

HOFFMAN, Cecil: Peacefully at home Thursday, Feb. 10, 2005, in his 84th year after a long struggle with Parkinson's disease. Beloved husband for 54 years of the late Evelyn, both of whom came to regard Florence, Italy as their second "home". Survived by sisters Ruth Tatton (Dick), B.C., Karen Duncan (David), Leamington, Lanny Joffe, Windsor, Dvorah Schlossberg (Meier) Israel, aunt Edie Newman, NYC, his wife's brother Leon Major (Judith), USA. Survived by numerous nieces and nephews in Ontario, B.C., the USA and Israel. Remembered by dear friend Shirley as well as many good friends, including in Italy.

Cecil remained a fastidious, meticulous gentleman throughout his life. He appreciated music, art, conversation, wine and fine dining. He is wished "Ciao Cesare, a la prossima".

The family especially wish to thank his caregiver Frederika Powell, trusted financial advisor and friend Dennis Caponi and devoted cousin-in-law Kathryn E. Hope (formerly Soboloff).

Donations to the Toronto Community Foundation re: the Evelyn Hoffman Foundation, to benefit the Humane Society, because of their tremendous love and admiration for their two Siamese cats, would be appreciated.

Graveside service, Fri., Feb. 11, 2005, 1 pm at Pardes Shalom Cemetery.

Coast to Coast

A fair and accurate depiction of the pullout dispute

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

For several weeks, the Israeli media have been reporting on the possibility of violent confrontations over the government's plan to withdraw all settlers and soldiers from the Gaza Strip and the northern West Bank this summer.

While there have been fewer stories on the disengagement plan in the North American media, we can expect more coverage now that it has been officially approved by the Israeli cabinet.

On the CBC's The National, Feb.18, Adrienne Arsenault reported about a vociferous minority of settlers and their supporters desperate to stop the disengagement. She began by noting that Israel is a "vibrant and vocal democracy" – a fact often forgotten by the Canadian public used to nightly televised images of Israeli soldiers and tanks confronted by Palestinians in the territories.

Opinion polls have consistently shown that approximately 70 per cent of Israelis support the disengagement plan, which according to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will help ensure that Israel remains a Jewish and democratic state.

Arsenault did an excellent job of further distinguishing between different sectors of this minority opposition: those who support legal and democratic protest methods – political protest, ads, lobbying – and the even smaller number who favour methods that are "dark and dangerous, threats aimed at killing not just the plan but the people behind it."

Unlike many reporters who stereotype all settlers as fanatics, Arsenault noted that "most were horrified recently when a few Gaza settlers started wearing Star of David patches, intentional echoes of the Holocaust." (This tactic ended quickly when the vast majority of Israelis, including settlers, expressed outrage over the Nazi comparison.)

Arsenault interviewed Meir Sheetrit, the cabinet minister responsible for guiding the disengagement plan through the Knesset. He revealed that he and his family have received extremely abusive, threatening letters. He said that the atmosphere of intimidation and threat in Israel is similar to 1995, when former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated for yielding land to the Palestinians under the Oslo accords.

Arsenault reported that nearly a dozen Israeli politicians in all have recently been threatened by right-wing extremists "who view the Gaza withdrawal as a desecration." Principal among those threatened has been the prime minister, who is now surrounded by an enhanced phalanx of bodyguards wherever he goes.

Arsenault's report was an accurate and fair depiction of reality for the majority of Israelis, including many settlers who are prepared to accept a financial compensation package to relocate.

Speaking of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state, an interesting comparison with the United States came to light recently on TVO's Diplomatic Immunity.

Host Steve Paikin interviewed Harvard professor Samuel P. Huntington, whose latest book Who Are We? discusses American cultural and national identity.

Paikin remarked: "Even though some people feel uncomfortable describing America as a 'Christian' country, the reality is, the demographics say it is. The percentage... of Christians in America [according to your book] is larger than the percentage of Jews in Israel, Muslims in Egypt and Hindus in India."

A quick check of the data confirms this fact: In Israel, Jews make up 78 per cent of the population, while approximately 15 per cent are Muslim. But in the United States, about 85 per cent of the population is Christian.

To be sure, this statistic, while interesting, must be kept in perspective, because the United States is not officially Christian. But it shows that a country can have a large majority of its citizens affiliated with one religion yet still be a vibrant democracy.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

BBYO CONVENTION: Teens from Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa gathered recently for BBYO's annual convention. Among its Judaic and social programming was the annual Beauheart dance, where a Beau and Sweetheart were named. Seen here, from left, are Brandon Lablong, Alana Zinman (Lake Ontario region presidents), Beau Ben Kanee, Sweetheart Michelle Shiewitz, and Eastern Canada region presidents Joelle Kenelson and Phil Lenetsky.

Nuclear terror a serious threat: expert

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The single most serious threat to the world today is nuclear weapons or material getting into the hands of terrorists, Graham Allison, a leading analyst of U.S. national security and defence policy, said at a McGill University conference.

Canada faces a "double threat" because its land and sea borders are "like a Swiss cheese that's almost all holes with very little cheese," and because the fallout of a nuclear explosion in the United States would be felt here, Allison said at the annual conference of the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada.

Allison, who was assistant defence secretary in the first Clinton administration, is now director of Harvard University's Center for Science and International Affairs and author of Nuclear Terrorism: The Ultimate Preventable Catastrophe (2004).

He believes the chance of nuclear terrorism can be "reduced to nearly zero" by a "multilayered, global response," and not by U.S. action alone. "Canada and the U.S. have to stand shoulder-to-shoulder," he said.

Otherwise, Allison said it is only a matter of time before Al Qaeda or a similar group uses a nuclear, chemical or biological weapon against the United States. A major problem is the unaccounted-for nuclear weapons and fissile material in the former Soviet Union that is left over from the Cold War, he said.

Allison proposes what he calls "the three no's: no loose nukes, no nascent nukes and no new nuclear states."

By this, he means setting a "gold standard" for clearing out or locking up all nuclear weapons and material, prohibiting the production by any country of any more enriched uranium or plutonium, and drawing the line at the current eight nuclear powers. About 50 to 60 states have the capability of producing nuclear weapons, he said.

"This is not an agenda the U.S. can pursue alone. It can't bully other states into doing this. It has to be a global collaborative effort," Allison said.

Canada, because of its principled stand on nuclear weaponry and international leadership in the past on its limitation, can play an important role, he said.

Barak 'not available' to speak at Concordia

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Former Israeli PM's foreign speaking schedule full until end of June

MONTREAL — Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak has declined an invitation from Concordia University president Frederick Lowy and Concordia Hillel to speak on campus this academic year, citing a too-busy schedule.

FEDERATION CJA official Bram Freedman said Barak's booking agency in New York informed the federation verbally that he is not accepting any new speaking engagements abroad until after June.

Freedman, federation's director of operations and strategic initiatives, said Concordia had proposed about four possible dates before the conclusion of the academic year at the end of April.

"He was certainly prepared to speak at Concordia, but unfortunately he is not available," Freedman said.

Concordia communications director Dennis Murphy said the alterations to the athletic complex at the Loyola campus, intended to make it secure enough to accommodate visiting dignitaries, were to have been completed by March 1. The university had indicated to the federation a couple of weeks prior to Barak's refusal that it was now able to host a speech by him on campus.

If Barak had accepted, the event would have taken place in the complex's arena, which seats between 1,500 and 2,000 people.

Lowy said in a statement that Concordia's invitation still stands.

"We will examine other possibilities with [Barak's] representatives through Concordia Hillel," Lowy said.

Hillel indicated it plans to continue to find a time when Barak can come.

Lowy made it known in late October that it was the university's "intention" to invite Barak on campus this academic year if a venue could be upgraded in order to allow it to be adequately secured. Lowy had, at the time, set June as the outer limit for this invitation. In December, Lowy announced plans to renovate a campus venue, following a security assessment.

Barak had earlier declined Concordia's invitation to speak under its sponsorship at an off-campus site, possibly Place des Arts, where university convocations are held.

Murphy would not specify what modifications have been made to the athletic complex or access to it, but he said the cost was not "exorbitant." The complex is located on the south side of Sherbrooke Street, opposite the main part of the Loyola campus.

Concordia's decision to not grant Hillel's request to sponsor a public lecture by Barak, tentatively scheduled for Oct. 19 at the Loyola campus, touched off a storm of protest from the Jewish community and Israeli officials in Canada. The administration said it would be too risky and disruptive, but offered to co-host Barak off-campus, which Hillel and the federation did not accept.

In September 2002, Concordia was the scene of a massive demonstration, which turned violent and ended in vandalism and a confrontation with riot police, on the day another former Israeli prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, also invited by Hillel, was set to speak in the main hall of the downtown campus. That event was cancelled by the university.

The campus group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights was opposed to Barak speaking on campus because they view him as a "war criminal" and had said it would hold a demonstration, if he did appear.

Although disappointed that Barak will not be coming this academic year, Freedman said the federation is "very pleased" that Concordia fulfilled its commitment to make it feasible for Barak to speak on campus.

Montreal Hillel's executive director Simon Bensimon said he also appreciated the university's co-operation in organizing the Barak visit. "We recognize the numerous demands on Mr. Barak's time in the next few months. We will continue our contact with his representatives to set up an eventual date."

Students enjoy kosher meals at U of T, York

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the first time in several years, kosher meals are available on both University of Toronto and York University campuses.

U of T's Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, home of Hillel of Greater Toronto, opened a café in September that is catered by chef Meir Halyo of Taam Tov Fine Foods.

Lisa Isen Baumal, Wolfond director, says that since the centre opened about one year ago they have had to bring in kosher food whenever they needed it, "so this is a big deal."

With both meat and dairy kitchens, the café is open for lunch, from noon to 3 p.m., Mondays to Thursdays. Whereas they used to offer Shabbat dinner once a month, it is now available every week.

"This has made a huge difference for students, faculty and members of the community. They're able to come in every day and get a nutritious, kosher, hot meal at a reasonable price. It can be their main meal of the day."

They have also catered a few kosher functions, she says.

Halyo, who prepares dairy lunches from Mondays to Wednesdays, and meat lunches on Thursdays, says all cooking is done on the spot.

"The students are eating very well. I offer [such dairy items as] soup, salads, pizza, falafel, and a variety of pastas, and on Thursdays we have stir-fries, chicken wings, chicken shish kebab – all kinds of things."

Friday night dinners – reservations are taken until Thursday afternoon – include challah, gefilte fish, soup, chicken or beef, and hot vegetables.

Since he doesn't have a commercial kitchen, everything tastes homemade, "just like mom makes. I have one dairy stove and one meat stove, so I cook in batches for about 40 or 50 people a day."

At York University, the kosher Country Style Coffee and King David franchise located in Winter's College offers such meals as salads, dairy pizza, falafels and bourekas, daily from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Representative Leah Mati says the location has been such a hit that students have suggested they open outlets on other parts of campus. "They really appreciate it. They're getting healthy meals at reasonable prices. They know they can count on a good meal every day."

Reunion to honour Chabad benefactors

But, says Rabbi Silberberg, a native of Brooklyn, the most important aspect is befriending the students. That way, students who have concerns have someone to talk to, he said.

The Silberbergs are "so non-judgmental, and they help everyone," said Walt, immediate past Chabad student club president.

In spite of the difference in Jewish observance level and upbringing between the Silberbergs and most Jewish students at Western, the Chabad shlichim say it was not difficult to find common ground. Their age was "a great advantage," said Nechamie, who was younger than many of the students when she arrived.

The social aspects of having friends and having a good time are the same for everyone, says Nechamie. Because she feels free to be herself, she said, students are open with her, and friendships have developed.

"We don't impose anything," said Rabbi Silberberg, explaining Chabad's philosophy. "The most beautiful part is to sit with all types of Jews. Everybody leaves their labels outside."

And in spite of the numbers, the Silberbergs feel it's important to have a family atmosphere at the dinners. Part of that feeling comes from having their four-year-old twins and one-year-old baby boy at the meals.

Not to mention that Nechamie, 25, prepares all the meals, with the help of student volunteers. For the potato kugel alone, she uses 30 pounds of potatoes a week.

"I really love what I do," she said. "It's fun. So many of the students are good friends of mine.

"To come and see so many people enjoying themselves, having a good time with Shabbat – it's a pleasure for me. I really love it. I'm not just saying that."

A typical Friday night meal, beginning with Kiddush and challah, will include – just for the first course – gefilte fish, eight different salads and dips like hummus and baba ghanouj. Then there's chicken soup with matzah balls and noodles, chicken, and a rotating array of side dishes like farfel, broccoli kugel, orzo and crunchy apple bake.

Dessert is usually a birthday cake, said Nechamie (née Rosler), who grew up in Toronto and is a niece of Rabbi Zalman Ahron Grossbaum, executive vice-president of Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario. Sometimes, especially on birthdays, parents join the crowd and sponsor a meal.

"It's a huge expense every Friday night, $1,000 easy," said Nechamie, who also teaches part-time at the local day school and at the Conservative supplementary school.

Lubavitch has had a presence at Western since 1961, when Yitzchok (Irving) Block became a faculty member as well as the staff person for then two-year-old Hillel. He is now the official shaliach for Chabad in London, while the Silberbergs serve as campus shlichim or shluchim (the Lubavitch pronunciation for shlichim, the Hebrew word for emissaries).

In 1961, there were only 71 Jewish students of about 5,000 at the university, compared to an estimated 3,000 out of 30,000 today, Block said.

Because a high percentage of current and former students are from Toronto, only 200 kilometres east of London, a celebratory fundraiser/reunion is being planned in Toronto to honour the Berg family, benefactors of Chabad of Western, and belatedly inaugurate the house. The event will be held on the evening of May 15 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, and will feature Harvard law school professor Alan Dershowitz.

The London organization's first house dates back to 1985, when Friends of Lubavitch of London purchased a bungalow on Bernard Avenue, a few blocks off-campus. The house was run by Block (who left Hillel at the time to avoid a conflict of interest) and subsequently by married couples who were Chabad shlichim.

The Silberbergs are the first couple to fill that role on a full-time basis. They have counterparts on-site at more than 100 campuses, including half a dozen in Canada, and not including many that are served by off-site Chabad houses.

"We are the biggest Jewish organization in the world," said Rabbi Silberberg, citing 2,500 centres in 70 countries. The organization's campus outreach dates back to the 1960s when it was begun to counteract "experimental drugs, cults and communes," according to a 2003 Lubavitch publication.

"It's a serious player in the Jewish community," said Rabbi Silberberg. "People are starting to understand that organizations have to work together. There's something everyone can contribute."

At Western, Chabad and Hillel representatives say they have a good relationship. Celebrations for holidays like Purim and Chanukah are organized jointly, and Chabad dinners do not run on the Fridays when Hillel runs dinners.

"We get along really well," said Walt, who served as an affiliate college representative to Hillel in her first year.

Jared Isaacson, executive director of Western Hillel, noted that some of his colleagues on other campuses do not have the same type of positive relationship with Chabad.

With an increase in attendance at Chabad dinners in the Silberbergs' third year, a decision was made to start looking for a larger facility. "There was a special heimishkeit – closeness – that we enjoyed [in the old house], but our goal was to get as many people as possible," said the rabbi.

When the Greek church that is now the Berg Family Chabad House was put up for sale a couple of years ago, its 9,000-square-feet, 40-car parking lot, and social hall with a capacity for more than 300 people, "actually seemed a little too big," he recalled.

Its features, including a commercial kitchen and even closer proximity to campus, made it very appealing.

And Chabad programs there have had broad appeal among the students. "We have students from liberal Reform families who would never dream of talking to somebody Orthodox, and they're literally our best friends – not because they're becoming religious. Most students are not becoming religious," said Rabbi Silberberg.

Walt, who comes from a Conservative background and attends Chabad services while in London, said, "It's convenient, and I like the way they do it. It's not too religious for me. Shul has never been so fun for me. They're young, everyone sings together, and there's dancing during prayers. There's a mechitzah, but in each of our sections we dance with each other. It's very spiritual, very uplifting. It's a great atmosphere to practise your Judaism in."

Chabad means "so much" to her, she said. "When I don't go home [for the weekend], I have a place to go here. It provides me with such a comfort, and a place I can go and feel proud to be Jewish."

Campus News in Brief

U of T follows up on 'Israeli Apartheid Week'

TORONTO — The University of Toronto is investigating four complaints about "content and commentary" associated with Israeli Apartheid Week, the Arab Student Collective event that took place on campus last month. The university has asked Toronto police for comments on allegations that fall under the criminal code, U of T spokesperson Jessica Whiteside said. As well, university administrators have started meeting with the groups involved – including Hillel, which ran its annual IsraelFEST the same week – about planning similar events in the future, Whiteside said.

Professor files complaint with York

TORONTO — York University professor David Noble has filed a union grievance, asking for $10 million from the university, according to York spokesperson Nancy White. The grievance has to do with a joint statement issued in November by the university, the York University Foundation (its fundraising arm), Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) and Hillel at York. The statement denounced Noble's actions in handing out literature at an SPHR event alleging the foundation is "biased by the presence and influence of staunch pro-Israel lobbyists, activities and fundraising agencies." SPHR later disassociated itself from the statement. York "will continue to promote a culture of mutual respect," White said. Efforts to reach Noble were unsuccessful.

New ideas for your mishloach manot basket

By MARCY GOLDMAN
Special to The CJN

Much like gift baskets for other mainstream holidays, Purim baskets or rather, mishloach manot baskets are also being exchanged by more people.

The idea is to incorporate the traditional elements: some hamantaschen, a gragger and candies or nuts, as well as other notions to create a theme.

Instead of a hodgepodge of items, each basket becomes a special little event, and gifts, both edible and not, have some connection to each other. I have included here some theme basket ideas along with a few special baking recipes to go in them. You can choose other recipes of your own to fill the baskets or consult my cookbook's Purim chapter or visit www.betterbaking.com.

These recipes are easy and inviting and good keepers; so you can bake a few days in advance. Purim is also a wonderful time to give an unexpected basket to someone you want to surprise or may have missed at Chanukah!

Purim Theme Baskets

Coffee lover's Purim basket:
½ lb. of specialty gourmet coffee
1 white ceramic mug package of kosher butter cookies
1 jazz CD

Chocolate lover's Purim basket:
selection of truffles selection of kosher milk and dark chocolate tin of imported real cocoa packet of marshmallows
a brownie pan and brownie recipe

Healthy Purim basket:
hamantaschen made with whole-wheat flour
a packet of green tea
a packet of chamomile tea
a small jar of honey a tofu snack bar incense
lavender sachet

Kid's Purim basket cookies made from hamantaschen dough and sprinkles kosher gummy bears gourmet lollipops toy balloons
storybooks
jelly bellies, or similar candies mini-bottle of kosher grape juice computer game software

PURIM AMARETTI

Almond scented, chewy crisp macaroon cookie bites. You will need a pastry bag for these or just use a spoon to drop off the batter. These would also be nice for Passover.

½ cup sugar
½ cup blanched almonds
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract, optional
1 8-oz. tube or can almond paste or marzipan
2 egg whites, approximately

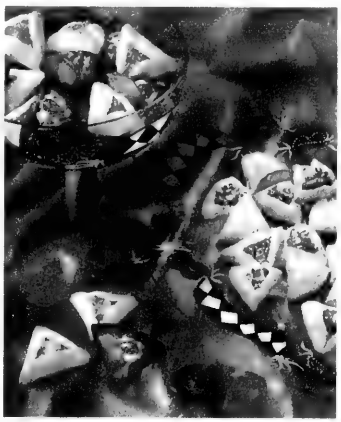
Preheat oven to 325. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper (or line 2-3 mini-muffin tins with mini papers).

In a food processor, whiz around the sugar until very fine. Then add in the almonds and pulse to grind up the almonds with the sugar. Add in the almond paste in chunks, drizzle on the vanilla (if using) and pulse, drizzling in the egg whites until you have a well combined, but soft batter/dough.

Scoop the batter into a large pastry bag lined with a ⅜-in. plain tip, or deposit batter in prepared muffin tins (really tiny ones).

If using pastry bag, deposit cookies of about 1 in. diameter on the baking sheet. Sprinkle top of cookies with coarse sugar.

Place cookies in oven, and reduce temperature to 300. Bake until lightly browned, about 20 minutes, or a bit less. Let cookies cool before using a metal spatula to remove them to a cooling rack. Makes 2-3 dozen.



MAGIC PURIM BARS

Condensed milk is the secret ingredient in these addictive, decadent treats. Magic? They are easy to do (like magic) and they disappear (like magic).

½ cup unsalted butter
1½ cups graham crumbs
1 14-oz. can condensed milk, sweetened
1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips
1½ cups shredded coconut
1 cup chopped walnuts or pecans

Spray an 8x11-in. pan (for thicker bars) or either a 9x13-in. or 12x7-in. pan with non-stick cooking spray. Preheat oven to 350. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper.

Put the graham crumbs and butter in the baking pan. Toss together and then pat out to line pan bottom. Spread condensed milk over the top, using a wet, angled metal spatula to spread as well as you can. Sprinkle the chocolate chips over the top, and follow with the coconut and the nuts. With your wet hand, press down slightly, all over.

Place pan on the parchment-lined baking sheet and bake until lightly browned, about 25-30 minutes. Cool well and then semi-freeze before cutting.

The larger pan makes thin bars, about 40. The smaller pan makes thicker, but smaller bars, about 20.

CHOCOLATE TRUFFLE COOKIES

This is a pillowy cookie that is part cake, part brownie, part cookie. These are nice with a dollop of dulce de leche on top or simply dusted in cocoa or drizzled with melted white and dark chocolate. Great for the chocolate lover's Purim basket.

1 cup or 4 oz. walnuts, preferably toasted
¾ cup sugar
3 eggs, room temperature or warmed in the shell in hot water, 3 minutes pinch salt
4 oz. semi-sweet chocolate, melted and cooled
½ cup all purpose flour
½ cup miniature chocolate chips

Preheat the oven to 350. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper.

In a mixing bowl fitted with a wire whisk attachment, whip the eggs, ½ cup of the sugar and salt on high, for 12 minutes or until the eggs are fluffy. Meanwhile, melt the chocolate on high in a microwave, in one-minute increments until melted (about 2-3 minutes) and cool.

In a food processor, grind up the nuts with the remaining sugar to make a grainy meal.

Into the egg mixture in the mixer, fold in the flour and salt, then the sugar-nut mixture and the chocolate chips. Blend well but try not to totally take the air out of it. Scoop out in small mounds onto baking sheet.

Bake until puffy but set about 11-15 minutes – too long a bake and they will be a bit hard. These set more as they cool. Makes 20-30 cookies. Dust with cocoa, confectioners sugar or melted white or dark chocolate. These are also good underneath a scoop of ice cream and hot fudge sauce or dulce de leche.

Israeli scientists develop sweet way to cut cholesterol

By ELI STUTZ
Special the The CJN

JERUSALEM — Are you battling high cholesterol? You may find grapefruit tasty but too sour. You may have tried the pomelo fruit, which is similar to grapefruit but larger and sweeter. Hebrew University's Dr. Shela Gorinstein has helped develop a native Israeli hybrid of the grapefruit and the pomelo – the pomelit – and discovered that it can significantly lower cholesterol levels.

Gorinstein and Prof. Abraham Caspi, head of the Cardiovascular Institute at Rechovot's Kaplan Hospital last year performed a study on 72 patients with hypercholesterolemia (high cholesterol levels). For one month, a third of the subjects were given 100 ml of pomelit juice, another third were given 200 ml, and the remainder received none.

Caspi and Gorinstein found that test subjects who were given pomelit juice experienced a decrease in their low density or "bad" cholesterol (LDL) and an increase in high density or "good" cholesterol (HDL). LDL causes arteries to be clogged (atherosclerosis), which in turn can lead to heart disease.

Gorinstein and Caspi performed their study in co-operation with research teams in Japan, South Korea, Germany, the Czech Republic and Poland. Each of the teams came to similar conclusions about the health benefits of the pomelit.

"If you have a cholesterol problem," Gorinstein says, "you should go on a special diet that includes eating a pomelit once a day. The grapefruit and the pomelo also lower cholesterol, but each has disadvantages. The grapefruit is very acidic, making it difficult for many people to digest. The pomelo is sweeter, but it's too big to finish in one sitting and is normally left for the next day, when it's already dried out. Not so the pomelit, which has the sweetness of the pomelo and the size of the grapefruit, making it easy to finish all at once."

The pomelit ripens over the fall and winter, changing in colour from green to yellow towards the end of winter when it's ready to be harvested.

How does the pomelit work to prevent bad cholesterol build-up? "The answer," Gorinstein says, "is the pomelit's anti-oxidant activity. Anti-oxidants prevent the oxidation of 'bad' cholesterol. When bad cholesterol is oxidized, it enters the arteries and blocks them." Gorinstein and Caspi found that the pomelit actually has a 15 per cent higher anti-oxidant activity than either the pomelo or the grapefruit.

The creation of the pomelit "is the result of a series of genetic manipulations," Gorinstein says. "But since the patent for these manipulations was bought by Israel 20 years ago, it's not something I can reveal. Since then, Israel has refined this process, producing the present day pomelit, which is far superior to the original version."

Gorinstein has made the search for natural ways to control cholesterol her life's work. She has studied beer, persimmon, apples, pears and even exotic fruit like Thailand's durian, looking for the ideal way to combat cholesterol. Earlier in her career, she proved that the persimmon fruit helps prevent clogged arteries (atherosclerosis). Before conducting her pomelit study on hospital patients, Gorinstein confirmed that pomelit juice lowers LDL in the lab and in animals. Still, it was only after the study on humans that she knew she had found a winner.

"I drink pomelit juice quite regularly," Gorinstein says. "Drinking the pomelit juice is just as good as eating the fruit. We compared eating and drinking, and found similar anti-oxidant activity in both methods. During the study, we gave the subjects juice, so that they wouldn't be able to tell what fruit we were giving them, and because quantities of juice are easier to measure."

Gorinstein plans to perform a further study in which bypass patients who are undergoing rehabilitation are given pomelit juice to see if it improves their chances of recovery. She's confident it will.

Pomelit juice is available in a product made by Jaffa called Sweetie Juice. Jaffa now exports Sweetie Juice to Germany, Poland, Sweden, Japan and Korea. Fresh pomelits are exported by Mehadrin Tnuport Export, Israel's largest grower and exporter of citrus fruit. Pomelit juice concentrate is now available in some American health food stores. If you cannot find it in your store, you could try asking the manager to import it.

Gorinstein can be contacted by e-mail at gorin@cc.huji.ac.il

Federal grants to boost medical research

The federal government recently announced new grants to help fund research networks that study, among other topics, arthritis and the increasing incidence of allergies and asthma.

The Canadian Arthritis Network (CAN), based at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, will receive almost $16.3 million over four years to find new ways to help people with the disease. For instance, a patient's own bone marrow could be implanted in the joints, in the hope that new cells will be built there and new cartilage may be made.

This research is especially important, said Jane Aubin, co-director of CAN, because of the recently identified risks related to drug therapies like the cox-2 medications, Vioxx and Celebrex.

Another goal, Aubin said, is to find out how different populations, such as Canadian Natives, are affected, and whether they might benefit from unique kinds of treatments.

AllerGen, based at the Michael G. DeGroote School of Medicine at McMaster University, is receiving almost $21 million, also over four years, to fund a study looking into whether a combination of genetic susceptibility and the environment might be causing the increase in allergies and asthma.

Judah Denburg, scientific director of AllerGen, said that "the study will look at external triggers, such as peanuts and ragweed, as well as auto-immune conditions, such as lupus and rheumatoid arthritis, where the immune system turns on its own body."

Aubin and Denburg both noted that the networks are composed of academics, as well as researchers from the biopharmacology, biotechnology, food and cosmetic industries. These researchers, who would not normally work together, may together make important advances in the fields of study.

Syria involved in suicide attack, Israeli officials say

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Military Intelligence chief, Maj.-Gen. Aharon Ze'evi Farkash, and senior officials from the Foreign Ministry briefed European diplomats in Jerusalem on Monday to explain the extent of Syrian involvement in last Friday's suicide attack in Tel Aviv, which killed five people.

They also presented evidence that Syrian-based groups have been involved in multiple attacks in addition to this weekend's suicide bombing.

In addition, a group of defence officials was to leave Israel this week for Washington, London and Paris, where similar briefings would be held.

Syrian President Bashar Assad has strenuously denied any Syrian involvement in the attack. The head of Military Intelligence's research division, Yossi Kupperwasser, insisted, however, that Israel has proof of Syria's involvement.

The Defence Ministry's director general, Ron Proshor, added that Israel could prove a link between the Islamic Jihad cell that carried out the attack and the organization's headquarters in Damascus.

"It is vital that the international community apply pressure on countries that sponsor terror. These groups harm the peace process," he said.

Earlier, former deputy chief of the Israel Defence Forces, Uzi Dayan, said Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is to blame for Friday's suicide attack in Tel Aviv, because he has failed to ensure that the West Bank separation fence is completed.

Dayan, who heads a public lobby group advocating construction of the fence, told a meeting of the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee that, had the fence been completed, the terrorist who carried out Friday's attack would not have been able to reach Tel Aviv.

Construction of the fence could be completed within less than a year, Dayan said, but that part of the route has still not been approved. He pointed out that just 214 kilometres of fence have been constructed thus far, out of a planned 600 kilometres. Another 200 kilometres are currently under construction, while construction of the southern section has not yet been started, since the government only approved the route last week.

Israel meanwhile opened a major diplomatic and public relations offensive against both Damascus and the Palestinian Authority (PA), focusing on what Israel views as Syrian support for terrorist organizations and the Palestinians' lack of full commitment to curb militants.

The cabinet, which launched the offensive Sunday in response to the bombing, advocates that pressure be placed on the PA to start dismantling terrorist organizations in the territories.

Without such action, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Sunday, no diplomatic progress will be possible, because the terror will continue, and Israel cannot accept that. He made similar statements at Sunday's cabinet meeting, and again later in the day at a meeting of his Likud party's secretariat.

"We've made it clear to the PA, and to the entire world, that Israel will not agree to any diplomatic progress as long as the Palestinians are not liquidating the terrorist organizations," Sharon told the Likud secretariat. "We want to make progress toward an agreement, but we will not agree to concede the security of Israel's citizens."

Sharon's threats of a freeze in the diplomatic process were treated with disdain by Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia. "If Israel wants to halt contacts with the Palestinians, it is free to do so," he said. "That's their affair. What do they expect from us in a case like this – that we shed tears?"

Qureia's comments were particularly surprising in light of the across-the-board denunciations of the attack by other Palestinian leaders, especially PA President Mahmoud Abbas.

At the cabinet meeting, Sharon said Israel is sure that Friday's bombing was perpetrated by Islamic Jihad members in the territories on orders from the organization's headquarters in Damascus.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said Israel has given the PA a list of wanted men, and expects it to begin arresting them immediately – especially those belonging to Islamic Jihad.

Israel's security forces will also take other action, including the arrest of Islamic Jihad members, he said.

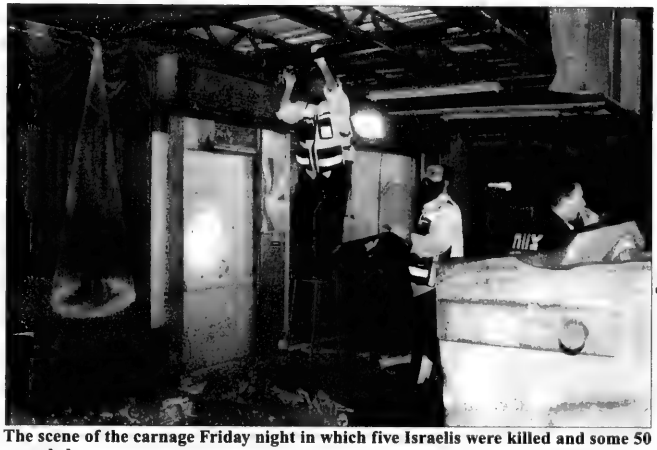
Some members from villages around Tul Karm, where the bomber came from, were arrested Saturday night, but the Israel Defence Forces are currently refraining from entering Tul Karm itself.

Mofaz also told the cabinet that Israel had decided to prevent Islamic Jihad's representative from travelling to Cairo on Tuesday for talks with leaders of the other Palestinian terrorist organizations about a formal ceasefire with Israel. As a result, Egypt postponed the talks until March 15, but Israel will not allow the representative to travel on this date either, Mofaz said.

Furthermore, he said, no Islamic Jihad members will be included in the list of 400 Palestinian prisoners that Israel plans to release in the coming months.

Israel demanded that the PA bring terror suspects to trial for murder.

National Security Council head Giora Eiland said Monday that with respect to their stated commitment to the Israeli-Palestinian ceasefire and to curbing militants in their midst, "the true test of the Palestinians will not be in their words."



The scene of the carnage Friday night in which five Israelis were killed and some 50 wounded. [Isranet photo]

Regarding suspects arrested in connection with terrorist attacks such as last Friday's blast, Eiland asked: "Will they be tried for murder, as is accepted practice in rational, normal places? Will they be judged accordingly, and pay the price accordingly?"

In the past, Palestinians have frequently rounded up terror suspects only to release them uncharged.

"The word democratization, in which people take so much pride, is not only a function of elections. It is comprised of several additional factors, and, from this standpoint, the attitude toward acts of murder is perhaps the first," Eiland said.

Halutz named next IDF chief; Ya'alon to leave post in June

By AMOS HAREL

TEL AVIV — Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz last week named Maj.-Gen. Dan Halutz as the next chief of staff, the first ever to come from the ranks of the air force.

Once his appointment is approved by the cabinet, where it is expected to pass without a hitch, Halutz, 57, will become the Israel Defence Forces' 18th chief of staff.

Mofaz selected Halutz ahead of Maj.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, who is now expected to retire from active service.

Mofaz summoned the two candidates to his office and informed them of his decision and a statement to the media was issued shortly afterward. Mofaz expressed his esteem for both men.

Military sources said that every effort will be made "to keep Ashkenazi within the military framework." One of the possibilities being discussed is that Ashkenazi will soon be appointed director general of the Defence Ministry, in place of Amos Yaron.

Another option being weighed is that Ashkenazi will remain in the IDF as head of military intelligence and will put himself forward as a possible replacement for Halutz at the end of his term. Security sources said, however, that no concrete proposals were discussed in the conversation between Mofaz and Ashkenazi.

Halutz had been considered the leading candidate since Mofaz decided not to extend Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon's term of office. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was said to be a full partner in the decision to appoint Halutz, who is known to be one of the prime minister's favorite officers.

Ya'alon's three-year term of office is due to end July 9, but he is said to be considering an earlier retirement, feeling the current date is too close to July 20, when the disengagement plan is due to be implemented. He may, therefore, retire early, and senior military sources said the date will likely be toward the end of June and be agreed upon by Ya'alon and Halutz.

Ya'alon spoke with Halutz and offered him his congratulations.

Halutz is expected to take a short leave of absence before taking over as chief of staff.

Mofaz's recommendation to appoint Halutz chief of staff will also be sent to the Bach Committee, which is charged with vetting senior appointments in the civil service and the military. Thereafter it will be brought before the cabinet.

The appointment is expect to survive both these tests, especially given a recent Supreme Court ruling that rejected a petition against Halutz's appointment as deputy chief of staff. The petition was filed after Halutz's comments on the targeted assassination of Hamas leader Salah Shehadeh, in which 15 civilians, including 11 children, were killed when an air force bomber dropped a massive bomb on Shehadeh's Gaza home.

The main challenge facing Halutz in the near future will be the implementation of the disengagement plan. In the slightly longer term, the appointment is a manifestation of the increasing importance of the Air Force, especially in dealing with the "outer circle" of threats to Israeli security, primarily Iran's nuclear program.

Halutz sees the position of chief of staff as more akin to that of the U.S. chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and he may well bolster the position of deputy chief of staff to include responsibility for the regional commands and the ground forces.

Mazuz defends fence

Israel's top legal official rejected the International Court of Justice condemnation of the West Bank security barrier as "irrelevant." In an affidavit filed in the High Court of Justice in response to petitions against the fence route, Attorney General Menachem Mazuz described the July 2004 ruling from The Hague as unfair and based on outdated information. It was the first time Israel had commented officially on the ruling.

On a rare official visit to Qatar, Israel's deputy education minister, Rabbi Michael Melchior, said he received a pledge from Qatari Foreign Ministry Director-General Jabel Al-Thani to stop broadcasts of an anti-Semitic show by Qatar's TV stations.

PA closes tunnels

Palestinian security services recently located and sealed 12 arms-smuggling tunnels along the Philadelphi route on the Gazan-Egyptian border, security sources said. The moves were ordered by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. The Palestinian successes have strengthened the long-standing opinion in the defence establishment that the arms-smuggling tunnels depend for their existence on the PA's tacit co-operation.

Anti-Sharon rally probed

Police Commissioner Moshe Karadi ordered a probe into possible incitement violations against participants at an anti-disengagement rally in Jerusalem. Thousands of activists who attended the rally, led by prominent rabbis last Thursday, received a pamphlet accusing Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of bringing a holocaust onto the people of Israel.

Inter-church group backs Israel divestment

CJN Staff and Wire Services

GENEVA — The World Council of Churches has urged its 347 member denominations to give "serious consideration" to pulling investments out of Israel to protest what it sees as mistreatment of Palestinians.

In calling for church-sponsored "economic pressure," the WCC on Feb. 21 gave strong support for last year's controversial decision by the Presbyterian Church (USA) to seek "phased selective divestment" from Israel.

"This [Presbyterian] action is commendable in both method and manner… and calls members to do the things that make for peace," the WCC's 150-member central committee said in its resolution, adding that "economic pressure, appropriately and openly applied, is one such means of action."

The Geneva-based WCC is the major ecumenical voice for the world's mainline Protestant, Anglican and Orthodox churches. It does not include the Roman Catholic Church or most evangelical or Pentecostal churches.

The Presbyterian threat of last July, which echoed divestment debates at some U.S. universities, has set off a wave of dissent in the church and angered American Jewish leaders.

Neither the Presbyterian nor Anglican churches in Canada say they are considering divestment. The Anglican Church of Canada has said it is not weighing the issue "at this time."

Neither is the Canadian Council of Churches, which represents 19 churches in Anglican, Eastern and Oriental Orthodox, Protestant and Roman Catholic traditions.

The Canadian body is not a member of the World Council of Churches and has no policy on the Middle East, said general secretary Rev. Karen Hamilton.

"There is no organic or institutional connection between us. We do not belong to them," Hamilton told The CJN.

While the World Council of Churches statement is significant, it is not binding on member churches.

The WCC said its concern was focused on companies that assist Israel in demolishing Palestinian homes, constructing settlements and erecting the controversial security barrier.

"Multinational corporations have been involved in the demolition of Palestinian homes," the WCC statement said, adding that they were also involved in "the construction of settlements and settlement infrastructure on occupied territory, in building a dividing wall which is also largely inside occupied territory, and in other violations of international law."

The unexpected resolution caught many American Jewish groups off guard and confirmed fears among some that the Presbyterians opened a Pandora's box last summer that now has the tacit approval of global Protestant and Orthodox leaders.

However, Rabbi Gary Bretton-Granatoor, interfaith director for the Anti-Defamation League, dismissed the WCC as "irrelevant," but he was nonetheless concerned that the divestment campaign has taken on a life of its own.

"The best thing we can do is continue to call it what is it – holding Israel to a double standard and using religious language to justify political ends," Rabbi Bretton-Granatoor said.

Since last summer, other U.S. churches, including agencies of the Anglican Communion, Episcopal Church, United Church of Christ and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), have examined whether to follow the Presbyterians' lead in taking some form of economic action against Israel.

The WCC said economic sanctions must be "equitable, transparent and nonviolent," but Jewish groups say the standards continue to be biased against Israelis without equal pressure on Palestinians to rein in violence.

David Elcott, interfaith director for the American Jewish Committee, criticized the WCC for an "ill-conceived and destructive" policy at a time when Israel is dismantling settlements and working with new Palestinian leadership.

"It's ironic that politicians are acting with greater moral strength than religious leaders," Elcott said. "If [the WCC] chooses to be irrelevant and take themselves out of the peace camp, they're welcome to do that."

Police chiefs, space officials visit Israel

Participants will tour holy sites and strategic defence positions, including the Golan Heights. They are slated to tour a portion of Israel's controversial security wall with members of the country's Border Patrol.

"It's the largest trip of its kind in the world as far as I know," enthused Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress who masterminded the mission. "The police chiefs from Ontario wanted to learn about security from the best, so Israel made sense."

Among the officials on the trip is Gwen Boniface, commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police.

Meantime, four executives from the Canadian Space Agency, led by president Marc Garneau, the first Canadian in space, end their four-day mission to Israel on March 3 after signing a historic agreement with their counterparts in the Jewish state.

The agreement, signed March 1 in Tel Aviv with Zvi Kaplan, director general of the Israel Space Agency, calls for increased co-operation and sharing of technology and information between Canada and Israel, notably in the areas of small satellites, Earth observation and youth awareness – all for peaceful purposes, officials stress.

The two countries' space programs developed an unintended closeness following the tragic accident on Feb. 1, 2003, in which the space shuttle Columbia broke apart on re-entry. Israel's first astronaut, Col. Ilan Ramon, was killed along with six others aboard the craft, delivering a stunning blow to Israel's modest space program.

Lauren Small of the Canadian Space Agency said it is customary for astronauts going into space to partner with a colleague not on the same mission. In case of tragedy, it becomes the Earth-bound astronaut's duty to accompany his late colleague's remains to his country of origin.

Ramon partnered with Canadian astronaut Steve MacLean, who returned Ramon's remains to Israel and "developed very close relations with Col. Ramon's widow, Rona," Small said.

Those close relations have been further cemented in a Jewish suburb of Montreal, where Ilan Ramon Crescent was recently unveiled. It's thought to be the first place in North America where a street has been named for the late astronaut. Ramon's family is to be invited to take part in a ceremonial inauguration of the street.

MacLean is training in Houston and is not on the trip to Israel, Small said, but noted that Rona Ramon is taking part.

Accompanying Garneau will be three other officials from the Canadian Space Agency, representatives from six Canadian industries in the space sector and Maureen Lofthouse of the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF), established in 1994 to promote collaborative R&D between companies in both countries.

The Canadian business executives will be examining further ties with the Israeli high-tech and space sector.

"The idea is to push Canadian industry," explained Small. "The majority of the work we do is contracted out. As traditional markets are saturated, Canadian industry is seeking opportunities in non-traditional markets such as the Middle East and Asia."

Small said Garneau will encourage Rona Ramon in her work promoting STARS (Space Technology and Research Students), a global program designed to stimulate interest among students in space exploration and research.

Israel's STARS program is led by the Technion's Asher Space Research Institute, as part of its mission to advance space education.

Canadian and Israeli space officials had initial meetings in Canada in 2003, when they signed a letter of intent aimed at further co-operation.

The Israel Space Agency was founded in 1983. Five years later, Israel became the eighth country to build and launch its own satellite, the Ofeq-1.

Meanwhile, the trip by the police chiefs is a joint project of the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police (OACP), Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Chairing the trip are Kwinter, York Region Police Chief and OACP vice-president Armand LaBarge, and CJC Ontario region chair Joel Richler.

Participants include Dr. James Young, adviser on security and forensics to Deputy Prime Minister Anne McLellan, and Paul Hamelin, president of the OACP and police chief in Midland.

Other Ontario regions represented by chiefs, deputy chiefs or officials are Windsor, Hamilton, Belleville, Durham Region, Ottawa, North Bay, Sudbury, Sault Ste. Marie, Dryden, Thunder Bay, Hanover, Chatham-Kent, Wawa and Owen Sound.

Also on the trip are the director of the Ontario Police College and the police chief of the Nishnawbe Aski Indian nation near Thunder Bay.

On March 1, Fantino assumed his new job as Ontario's Commissioner of Emergency Management.

Staffing the trip are Farber and Morris Zbar, former deputy minister of Ontario's correctional services ministry and now with UJA Federation.

Accompanying both trips is Ephraim Shoham, Israel's trade commissioner to Canada.

March Break

My March Break was great. We stayed at the Renaissance Fallsview Hotel in Niagara Falls. Mom says the rate we got to stay with two kids is a really good deal. She even talked Dad into the 2 Night Family Package. After a walk down to the Falls, we had to get back to the hotel so that we could go to the family Indoor Pool Party. After that my sister and I had a great time in the arts and crafts Activity Room.

SPECIAL MARCH RATES available until March 27

There were so many things to do at the hotel: PlayStation, watch Movies, play squash & racquetball. We had a fantastic time and can't wait for next year's visit!

The Plot

Adapted from the book of Esther 2:21-23

The following story takes place in ancient Persia, in the days of King Achashverosh.

Twittering birds filled the blossom-laden trees lining the walkway in front of the palace. In the shade of the trees, on an ornate bench, sat Mordechai the Jew. He had grown up in Jerusalem, but the Temple had been destroyed and all the Jews exiled. Now they were scattered across the vast kingdom of Persia.

Amazingly, Mordechai's cousin Esther had become queen, although nobody knew she was Jewish. On her recommendation, Mordechai had become the king's adviser. Sitting by the palace gates, he would observe the comings and goings of the many nobles and diplomats who came to meet with the king...

Tarshian! Somebody behind him was speaking in Tarshian.

"Let me tell you Bigtan, I can't wait to get this over with. Let's do it tonight."

"Fine with me...whoa!" His voice dropped to a whisper. "There's someone on the bench over there."

"You're right. Hey, it's that Jew..."

"Shh! He's going to hear you!"

"So what? I don't think a single person in this city understands Tarshian."

"Good point. Especially not old rabbis." Mordechai suppressed a smile. In fact, he was fluent in Tarshian, and in 69 other languages too. Anyone who served as a judge on the "supreme court" of Israel had to learn the 70 languages of the world. That way, they could hear testimony directly from witnesses, preventing crucial details and nuances from being lost in translation. Mordechai hadn't heard Tarshian in many years, but he still understood it well. Never taking his eyes off his scroll, he listened intently.

"Our break is over in two minutes, so we have to work this out quickly. What kind of poison do you want to use?"

"Snake venom. It's odourless and almost impossible to detect."

Mordechai turned to the next column of his scroll, pretending to be completely absorbed in his studies.

"Good. The king always asks for water before he goes to bed. I'll slip the venom in his cup, and everyone will think he died in his sleep."

"Ha!" cackled Bigtan. "Death to the fool who thinks he's our king!"

"Uh, Bigtan?"

"What?"

"We have to get back to our posts now."

"Oh."

The two of them silently walked away, leaving Mordechai alone on the bench, his heart racing.

"Bigtan, I'm ready for my water!" called the king.

Bigtan hurried in with the golden cup, desperately trying to act as naturally as possible. The king took the cup, looked inside, and frowned. "This water looks funny. Get me a different cup."

"Your...Your Majesty..."

"What, the water looks fine to you? Here, take a sip."

Bigtan turned pale. "No...I can't..." was all he could get out, his knees quivering.

"Oh, so there is something wrong with this water. Guards! Bring me Abysinnia and her water bowl!"

The doors flew open and a servant entered, carrying the royal cat and her royal water bowl. At the king's command, the bowl was filled. The cat sniffed at the water, and lapped it up. Everyone breathlessly watched Abysinnia for a few seconds. Then she suddenly shuddered and fell over.

"Seize this man!" bellowed Achashverosh, and the guards did.

Achashverosh turned to his queen. "Thank you, Esther — that was close."

"Oh, I don't deserve the credit. The thanks go to Mordechai. He's the one who tipped me off."

Story shows that it's OK to be different

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It can be very hard to move to a strange place, especially when you are different from the people who already live there.

In Sereena's Secret, searching for home, by Rae Ann Harris and David Weintraub, Pitsopany Press, 2004, Greena-Sereena lived on a beautiful island. She and all the other birds who lived there had magnificent green feathers, and they were all very happy.

Then "that beautiful island began to tremble. It shook so hard that the little green birds started falling out of their trees." The island cracked open, and the trees and everything else caught on fire.

Greena-Sereena and her two best friends, Greena-Patreena and Greena-Fareena, flew to a nearby island where they had heard that "worms jump into your beak."

When they got there, though, they discovered that only blue, red and yellow birds lived there. The other birds attacked Greena-Sereena and tried to force her off the island.

Greena-Sereena had an idea. She rolled around in a pile of red sand until she turned all red. She could then join the other birds on the island – provided, of course, that she snuck out every morning to roll in the sand.

Her friends were shocked. "Sereena, we're not leaves. We don't change colours whenever we want," Greena-Patreena exclaimed.

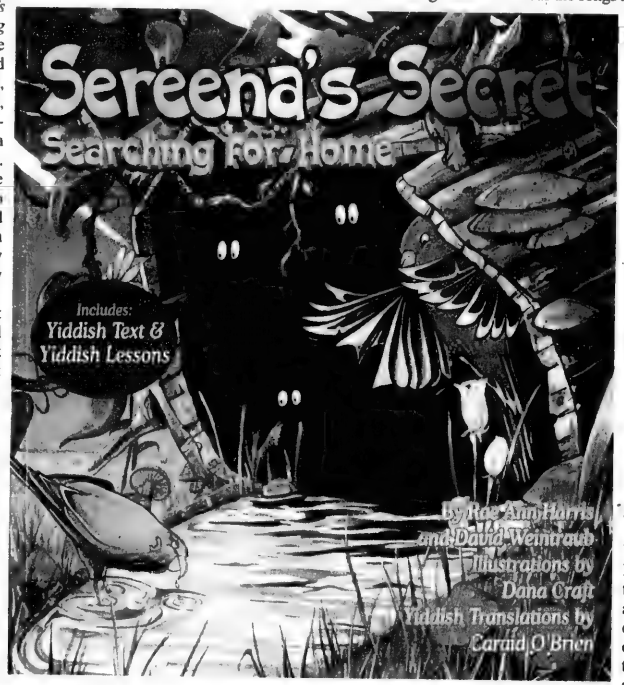
Sereena made new friends and was very happy.

But things changed again. She laid an egg, and when it hatched, she discovered that her new baby was all green! Still, she thought that her baby was beautiful. She was going to roll him in the red sand too, but then she realized that she could not do it.

She went back to her new friends and told them the truth (actually, she jumped into a puddle and the red sand washed off). She proudly announced: "Take me or leave me, but this is who I am!"

To her shock, her new friends also jumped into the puddle. They turned out to be orange, pink and white.

Sereena taught the other birds the songs and stories from her old home. "I am so happy to be who I am," she exclaimed. "And to find that, no matter where we all come from, we still have so much in common."



At the end of the book, the authors explain what the book is really about. From the late 1800s to the late 1900s, several million Jews fled their homes in eastern Europe and came to the United States and Canada. They weren't fleeing volcanoes and fires, but persecution, violence and discrimination.

They found, like Sereena, that life was hard and they weren't accepted. They did everything they could to fit in with the new culture and forget their ways, their customs and even their language.

The story of Sereena, the authors say, shows that your own unique cultural heritage is what makes you special.

This book is different in that it is written in both English and Yiddish. In the back are lessons to help you learn some Yiddish words, projects to colour and cut out and even a project to learn about the true meaning of kindness and friendship.

Dance drama portrays the eccentricity of a Jewish family

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

In most cases a spoon serves one purpose, but for dancers Allan and Karen Kaeja, a spoon represents all the drama, dialogue and tension found in a good murder mystery.

In Asylum of Spoons, Kaeja d'Dance's latest production, Allan choreographs his wife, along with six others, in a haunting look at the family dynamic. But if it wasn't for one fateful day at Honest Ed's, the critically acclaimed Asylum would never have materialized.

"Asylum of Spoons was originally called Silent/Still, and it started with a very different idea," says Allan on the telephone from Montreal. "The original premise was that it was taking place in an abandoned home and the pores of the walls were recalling generations of life and activity.

"About a week and a half into the rehearsal process, I was walking through Honest Ed's and they had these stunning stainless steel spoons on sale and I walked in and bought 40 spoons, just on impulse. Silent/Still was already developing, and I never told the dancers about the spoons. I set up the scene, I put the spoons on the table and I said, 'Play the scene.'"

As soon as the dancers began weaving the spoons into their scenes, it was apparent to Kaeja that the play was morphing into something new.

"Asylum, in its original intention, was still based upon the family and murder. With the spoons I could really begin to mine the characterization that was developing, the relationships of these people and the movement dynamics," says Kaeja.

As the play grew, so did the number of spoons. Now 2,000 of these kitchen utensils are thrown around and tossed across the stage.

As the title suggests, the spoons are an integral part of this production, but it's the story of a dysfunctional family and a murder, or the Asylum half of the moniker, which gives the play its substance.

The obvious question to ask about a play dealing with family is if it is autobiographical. Kaeja says that his family and the family in the play each have seven members, but, other than that, the family in the play has little to do with his own.

"This does not directly reflect my family," he says. "If you reproduce the perfect family, it's never that interesting, but because characters are so complex and people are complex and rich… there are always going to be associations with people who you know," says Allan. "Jewish families are all eccentric. This eccentricity just happens to go over the deep end."

Karen and Allan met 20 years ago at a dance rehearsal. Since then they have created an internationally recognized dance group and have developed a widely used curriculum for teaching dance in schools.

As business and life partners, it would be easy to think that Karen draws on her marriage to play the matriarch in Asylum's family, but that is not the case. "I don't think I draw on my relationship with my family at all," says Karen.

"I draw on the potential wackiness of a woman who's obsessed with unconditional love," adds her husband.

"She [the matriarch] likes her dominant role, and plays with the way people challenge her or try to gain power over her," says Karen.

"Like so many mothers," adds Allan, "she wants the perfect family at any cost."

Asylum of Spoons will be staged at Harbourfront Centre from March 1 to 5, but for those who can't make it to the show, a film adaptation is scheduled to air in September. While the film will be similar to the stage performance, Allan says some adaptations need to be made to make it work on the big screen.

"When you turn a stage production into a film production, you have to re-envision what the piece is, you have to re-look at what its context is, what its environment is," says Kaeja. "So when I'm writing the screenplay, what I'm doing is taking the essence of the piece."

One major change from stage to film is that the movie takes place in a turn-of-the-century setting, unlike the play, which concludes in a contemporary environment. As well, a movie affords Kaeja the ability to play with his surroundings.

"One of the things you can do with film that you can't do with the stage work is if you want something, then it's there. You can create it," he says. "Tanya [Crowder] does this one solo, and in my mind it has always taken place in a river. Well now I can do it."

One thing that won't change are the dancers. The same stage performers, including Karen, will reprise their roles on film. However, it won't be the same old routine for the actors. She says acting in front of the cameras is nothing like performing for a live audience.

"When I'm performing for the camera, it's as if I'm performing for millions and millions of people," says Karen. "On the same note, I feel it's even more private. It's almost like entering a private moment of my life. On a stage it's personal, but less private."

To get tickets for Asylum of Spoons, which runs from until March 5 at Harbourfront Centre, call 416-973-4000.

The Diaspora is a rich chronicle of Jewish history

The Diaspora and the Lost Tribes of Israel* by Amotz Asa-El, Hugh Lauter Levin Associates, Inc.

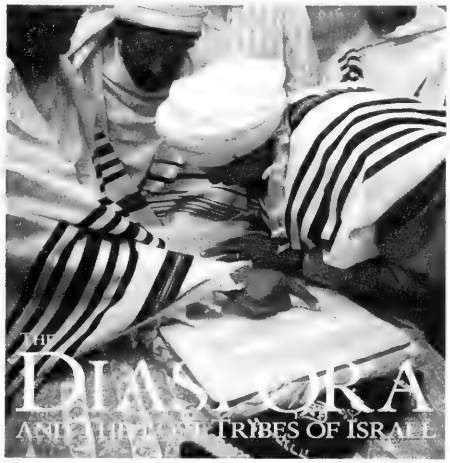
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jews have wandered the world and created an archipelago of diverse communities. From Asia and Africa to Europe and the Americas, there has been a Jewish presence.



Amotz Asa-El's far-ranging, lavishly illustrated 300-page coffee-table book, The Diaspora and the Lost Tribes of Israel, is a rich testament to Jewish ubiquity far and near.

Contrary to conventional wisdom, the Diaspora emerged before Rome's conquest of Judea, when Jews settled in the Mediterranean basin.

In contrast to Christian and Muslims, who seldom left their homes in pre-modern times, Jews were well-travelled. Jewish merchants mapped out intricate trade routes. The philosopher Moses Maimonides started life in Spain and went to Morocco and the land of Israel prior to settling in Egypt.

Persecution and tolerance were the leitmotifs of the Jewish experience. Under the Byzantines, Palestine was gradually emptied of Jews. But in the fullness of time, Egypt became a major medieval Jewish centre. The idyll ended in the mid-13th century with the rise of the intolerant Mamluk dynasty.

As Asa-El points out, Italy is one of the few countries that has hosted a Jewish community uninterruptedly since antiquity. As Christianity expanded, however, Italian Jews faced increasing discrimination.

The "golden age" in Spain, ushered in by the Muslim conquest, came after centuries of Christian anti-Semitism. Jews thrived under the flag of Islam because Muslims needed allies.

With the infamous expulsion in 1492, Spanish Jews found a haven in the Ottoman Empire. Yet in Europe, Ashkenazi Jews were devastated by the Crusades.

The mass settlement of Jews in Poland was triggered by worsening conditions in the German lands. In neighbouring Ukraine, Jews were massacred by Bogdan Chmielnicki and the Tatars.

As he proceeds, Asa-El charts the return of Jews to England under Oliver Cromwell, the prosperity they enjoyed in Amsterdam, the civic rights they were granted in post-revolutionary France and the indignities and restrictions they suffered in Romania and imperial Russia.

Not until the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution would Russian Jews be completely free and enjoy untrammelled rights. Yet their status in the Soviet Union after World War II declined precipitously as Joseph Stalin declared war on the Jewish community.

By the 19th century, 90 per cent of the world's Jews lived in Europe. But with the exodus of Jews from eastern Europe in the wake of the 1880s pogroms, the Jewish population of the United States increased exponentially. As Asa-El observes, "The United States was, by far, the largest, farthest and most successful migration movement in the Diaspora's entire history."

Canada is curtly dismissed in three lines and, even then, Asa-El falters when he states that Canada's Jewish population is now estimated to number 280,000. Add at least 100,000 to that figure.

In closing his meditation on the Diaspora, he notes that Israel, for the first time in about two millennia, will revert to the status quo ante and soon will have the biggest Jewish community in the world.

Asa-El's ruminations on Israel's lost tribes are quite interesting. But more fascinating is his discussion of vanished Jewish communities and of Jews whose origins remain shrouded in mystery.

And so he touches on the Karaites, the Afghan tribes, the Chinese Jews of Kaifeng, the Turkic Khazars and, of course, the Beta Israel of Ethiopia.

In a volume of this sheer length and breadth, factual errors are bound to appear, and they do. But the author can be forgiven because, in sum, The Diaspora is a serious work that merits our attention and deserves a place in any good library.

I WAS A TEENAGE FEMINIST AIRS ON W NETWORK

I Was A Teenage Feminist, a documentary by Toronto native Therese Shechter of Brooklyn-based Trixie Films, is being shown on the W Network next week.

Shechter, equipped with a video camera, crisscrossed "the country and her own psyche in the hope of reclaiming feminism as a source of personal and political power," according to promotional material.

"Feminism and Judaism have enjoyed a long and fruitful connection," Shechter told The CJN, "and although the film is not about Judaism per se, it features several noted Jewish feminists." They include Gloria Steinem, Letty Pogrebin, Jennifer Pozner – and Shechter's mother, Myriam Shechter, a CJN contributor who "shares some very wise things about being a woman, all the while cooking matzah balls for our family seder."

The show is "a great starting point for a discussion about modern views of feminism – and it's funny!" Therese says. I Was A Teenage Feminist airs on March 8, International Women's Day, 8 p.m. www.trixiefilms.com

Theresa Tova brings theatrical flair to her Yiddish performances

By NAOMI BELL
Special to The CJN

Theresa Tova

When Theresa Tova was 11 years old, she starred in a Holocaust play at the Peretz Shule in Calgary. Portraying a mother whose baby had been thrown into the air and shot by the Nazis, she hurled herself against the Aron Kodesh and delivered a long, anguished monologue. From that moment, Tova knew she wanted to be an actor.

High school brought drama instruction and participation in many plays. By the time she was ready for university, Tova had been offered five professional shows. She turned them all down to attend the four-year bachelor of fine arts acting program at the University of Alberta in Edmonton. For two years after graduation, she worked the western theatre circuit as an actor, but not yet as a singer.

In the fall of 1979, Tova came to Toronto to break into the local theatre scene. After six months without an audition, she landed the role of Bloody Mary in South Pacific at the Limelight Dinner Theatre. Another audition, this time for the Shaw Festival, brought her the singing role of Wanda, the Indian princess, in Rudolf Friml's operetta Rose-Marie. Summer of 1980 found Tova in Niagara-on-the-Lake singing six-part harmony without ever having studied music! Then she decided to take singing lessons.

Tova has rarely stopped working. Three months after her son was born, she was portraying a "tough chick" in a rock musical at Theatre Passe Murraille. In 1986, the year her daughter was born, she played Mrs. Van Daan in a Young Peoples' Theatre production of The Diary of Anne Frank, for which she was awarded a Dora Award nomination. Three years later, she began a five-year stint as Marge in the TV drama E.N.G., which earned her a Gemini Award nomination for best supporting actress.

During the TV run, Tova was invited to sing jazz and show tunes at a gay bar on Church Street, and she loved it. "For the first time," she recalls, "I sang as me instead of a character in a play, and it was liberating!

Yiddish Diva loves performing 'the Jewish stuff'

" It gave me a chance to expand my repertoire, and I enjoyed interacting with the audience." That Saturday night gig continued for two years.

One night, five members of the Toronto Holocaust Committee were in the audience. They had heard that a Jewish girl was singing in a gay bar on Church Street, and had come to audition her. They loved her act and invited her to sing at a Holocaust program. It was her first performance at a Jewish event. Ashkenaz, a Jewish Film Festival gala, and the annual Yiddish Concert in Earl Bales Park followed, as well as a touring production called From Belz to Broadway.

"I loved the Jewish stuff – it was like finding myself! Although I had been a performer for years, I had never used Yiddish material. As a child of Holocaust survivors I had heard the stories, of course, and now the songs spoke personally to me."

As she expanded her Yiddish repertoire, Tova decided to write a musical about her mother's Holocaust experiences. Still the Night premiered at Theatre Passe Muraille in 1996. It won four Dora Awards and was nominated for a Governor General's Award for excellence in literature.

In 1998-99 Tova played the role of Emma Goldman in the first national Broadway tour of Ragtime, and the summer of 2000 found her at Stratford playing Yenta in Fiddler on the Roof, as well as Lady Jane in Gilbert and Sullivan's Patience.

In Stratford, Tova made her first CD, Telling Stories, a collection of Yiddish theatre and folksongs. With witty English translations by Hindy Nosek-Abelson and stylish musical direction by John Alcorn, it ranges from tender renditions of Vu Ahin Zol Ich Geyn and Unter Dayne Vayse Shtern, to wickedly funny performances of Harshl and Leybke Mayn Lieber.

Since 2000, she has led Yiddish song workshops in Paris, Switzerland and Holland, and has given numerous performances in New York, Montreal, Boston and San Francisco. In the fall of 2004, she opened the Mabel Mercer Cabaret Convention in New York, where she sang for an audience of 2,000.

Tova continues to blend the jazz idiom with Yiddish song, and often alternates between English and Yiddish. Her second CD, Live at the Top O'the Senator, recorded before a live audience at the jazz club, includes a witty Yiddish rendition of Cole Porter's Night and Day (Tog un Nakht), as well as an English version of Vos Iz Geven Iz Gevez (What Was Is What Was). It concludes with an electrifying performance of Der Saksafon Shpiler by New York poet Beyle Schaechter-Gottesman.

Her warm friendship with Gottesman has enriched Tova's life and deepened her understanding of Yiddish song. Coached in interpretation by the distinguished poet, Tova is adding more of her songs to her repertoire. A recent program for Friends of Yiddish left an enthusiastic audience eager to hear more of Gottesman's poetry and songs.

Tova brings great theatrical flair to her performances. "When I first came on the scene I was fighting the purists," she says.

"'Why do you change the songs?' they asked. 'Don't you know that's not the way it's supposed to be done?' But I can't just sing a song without interpreting it. I'm a storyteller, and I try to place words and music within their dramatic context. I want the audience to understand and to feel the emotion."

Naomi Bell lectures on Jewish folksong.

Koffler Chamber's strong debut

BY STEPHEN CERA
Special to The CJN

Toronto's newest chamber orchestra debuted recently before a near-capacity audience at Leah Posluns Theatre.

The string orchestra – oddly named the Koffler Chamber Music Society, which sounds more like a chamber-music-concert presenting organization than an orchestra or ensemble – consists of some 21 musicians. About a half-dozen are professionals, while the rest participate for their own pleasure.

The ensemble, presented by the Koffler Centre of the Arts School of Music, was conducted by Jacques Israelievitch, concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Israelievitch chose a challenging program for the debut.

The Koffler chamber orchestra sometimes substitutes fervour for sheer polish, and it can sound a bit uneven section to section (the first violins strong, the violas comparatively tentative). But there was evidence of much hard work, dedication and future promise on stage.

The evening's program opened with a Sinfonia by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, the most famous and prolific son of Johann Sebastian. The playing was a bit tight, rather than relaxed or confident.

Israelievitch, conducting without a baton, had obviously instilled cohesion and smoothness, yet the musical phrasing tended to sound beat-oriented, with a sense of vertical pressure that prevented phrases from expanding naturally.

To some extent, this quality resurfaced in Dvorak's Serenade for Strings in E, the most ambitious undertaking of the evening and centrepiece of the program. This is a sunny and deceptively easy Romantic-era masterpiece whose adventurous string writing would tax even the finest orchestras.

The orchestra's performance of the piece showed much accomplishment, notably in the warmth and affection of the playing. But it needed even more graceful phrases and fullness of string tone.

Benjamin Britten's Simple Symphony received the most satisfying performance of the evening. It was a canny repertoire choice on the part of Israelievitch, as the players relished the youthful English composer's imaginative string writing that recast earlier musical styles. The symphony's third movement, "Sentimental Sarabande," enjoyed particularly eloquent treatment.

The closing work, J.S. Bach's Concerto for Two Violins, introduced as soloists Israelievitch and his TSO colleague Semyon Pertsovsky. They matched and dovetailed their phrasing beautifully. Both are highly accomplished and experienced players. For some reason, they adopted exceedingly fleet tempos for the opening and final movements, and as a result much contrapuntal detail was obscured in the wash of sound.

Less frenzied speeds would have allowed the musical lines to unfold more clearly. In the slow movement, the music could breathe, and the effect was poetic.

Ideally, a harpsichord continuo would have supplemented both Bach works.

Chemist helped develop cancer and HIV wonder drugs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Thanks to determined drug hunters like Julian Adams, sufferers of multiple myeloma cancer and HIV can breathe a little easier.

Adams, a Quebec City-born organic chemist, has been credited with helping develop two major drugs, Velcade and Viramune. Both have helped tens of thousands of people in North America and around the world.

Velcade, a drug known as a proteasome inhibitor and administered through intravenous injection, is taken by multiple myeloma victims who have failed to respond to all other conventional forms of treatment.

Multiple myeloma – bone-marrow cancer – affects 50,000 people a year in the United States and usually kills more than two-thirds of them within five years of diagnosis.

Viramune, the first in a class of HIV drugs called non-nucleoside reverse transcriptase inhibitors, is ingested as a pill as part of a cocktail of medications to fight that deadly disease. Much to Adams' satisfaction, Velcade and Viramune have proven themselves.

A 50-year-old McGill University graduate, he describes Velcade as "a breakthrough therapy drug" and Viramune as "extremely effective."

But it took Adams and his dedicated team of researchers years to develop these wonder drugs.

"You have to be pretty tenacious," said Adams, the chief scientific officer of Infinity Pharmaceuticals, based in Boston, Mass., the hub of drug company startups in the United States.

"You need an eye for detail," he added. "A lot of things can go wrong."

Adams, who completed his post-graduate studies at Columbia University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, does not rest on his laurels.

Now striving to develop even better agents than Velcade and Viramune, he is encouraged by the results so far.

But of course, all new drugs are subjected to human trials and succeed or fail on the crucible of that time-honoured rigorous process.

Approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration in 2003, Velcade has been in the news lately.

As Adams readily acknowledged, two Israeli scientists affiliated with Haifa's Technion, Avram Hershko and Aaron Ciechanover, the co-winners of last year's Nobel Prize in chemistry, established the basic science for its discovery.

"They opened the field," noted Adams, who parlayed their stunning achievements in applied research. "I'm proud to be associated with Nobel Prize winners."

Partially funded by the Israel Cancer Research Fund, Hershko and Ciechanover were cited for discovering the process – the ubiquitin system – that lets cells destroy unwanted proteins.

If proteins are not disposed of properly, cells continue to divide unchecked and cause cancer.

Velcade, the first drug that specifically targets the ubiquitin system, is sold in 27 countries, including Israel, but has yet to be approved in Canada.

According to Adams, Velcade – whose projected sales in 2004 were about $150 million (US) – will be available in Canada this year.

But Velcade, which has brought him significant wealth, does not come cheaply. Each injection costs close to $1,000 (US) and, typically, a person requires 20 to 30 injections.

Asked why Velcade is so expensive, Adams said, "It's priced right in the middle of the new cancer agents."

While Velcade acts as an inhibitor, with a high 35 per cent success rate, it is not a cure for multiple myeloma, the symptoms of which range from bone pain and weight loss to nausea and numbness in the legs.

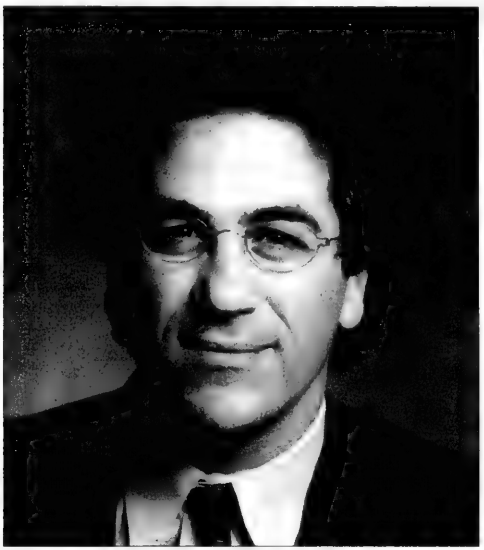
"A cure implies that every single cancer cell has been destroyed," explained Adams. "That usually doesn't happen."

Yet, as he pointed out, Velcade can prolong a person's life, and therein lies its value as a drug.

He and his fellow researchers at ProScript, Inc. discovered Velcade in the mid-1990s, four years after they started working on the problem and long after Hershko and Ciechanover had figured out the basic science.

Adams was then ProScript's executive vice-president in charge of research and development.

Before joining ProScript, he was employed by Boehringer Ingelheim Pharmaceuticals, where he and a group of chemists synthesized Viramune in the late 1980s.



Julian Adams has been credited with helping develop two major drugs, Velcade and Viramune. Velcade is taken by multiple myeloma (bone-marrow cancer) victims who have failed to respond to all other conventional forms of treatment.

Sold in 50 countries, including Canada, Viramune has registered sales of about $400 million (US).

But in Africa, where the HIV virus is widely prevalent and poverty is endemic, Viramune is virtually given away free.

Adams, who currently directs the activities of 85 researchers at Infinity Pharmaceuticals, launched his career as a drug hunter at Merck Frosst Canada in Kirkland, a Montreal suburb.

He had set his sights on becoming an academic after finishing his post-doctoral studies at Columbia University, but such openings were scarce in the early 1980s. However, from 1994 to 1997, Adams – who has published 102 scientific papers since 1978 – was an adjunct professor in the department of chemistry at Boston University.

Adams joined Merck Frosst, where he honed and polished his talents as a researcher. There, in conjunction with Robert Zamboni, he created Singulair, a popular asthma drug.

"I grew very well into this discipline," he said of his days as a researcher, "and today I have no desire to be an academic. I use my skills to devise biological solutions to disease."

In the late 1980s, Adams moved to the United States to exploit greater opportunities for personal growth. He has not looked back since.

Adams, who enjoys travel, chess, sports and reading in his spare time, grew up in Montreal and graduated from Westmount High School.

His interest in science took off after his Romanian immigrant parents, Marcel and Annie Abramovici, gave him a chemistry set when he was a boy.

"My mother had studied chemistry at McGill prior to meeting and marrying my father," explained his younger brother, Sylvan. "As Julian was the first born, she certainly had an influence on his outlook toward the sciences."

The Abramovicis immigrated to Canada in 1951 via Israel, Morocco and France. They anglicized their surname because Adams was far easier to pronounce and spell.

Adams' father and brother are in the real estate business and live in Montreal. His sister, Linda, a mother of four who practised law briefly, is married to Gil Troy, a McGill history professor, author and newspaper columnist.

Sex, loyalty and intermarriage

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Raymond and Hannah* by Stephen Marche, Doubleday Canada.

When Jewish kids announce they're getting married these days, chances are their partner is of a different faith. And so it goes with Raymond and Hannah.

Raymond, 25, is described as being five-foot-ten, light-haired with blue eyes and is a candidate for a doctorate in English literature. Hannah, 24, is five-foot-six, has dark eyes, long dark hair and wears no lipstick. The two meet at a spring party and begin a physical and intellectual relationship that moves from Toronto to Jerusalem and back again.

On the surface, Stephen Marche's debut novel, Raymond and Hannah, resembles a traditional love story with a meeting, a passionate, week-long affair, love and a separation. But the story, told alternately through Raymond and Hannah's perspectives, deals with current issues such as sexuality, intermarriage, independence, loyalty and betrayal.

Readers take note – the first 27 pages contain explicit sexual content and reveal an honesty that the author never turns away from. Once their passionate encounters are described in incredible detail, they begin their personal journeys.

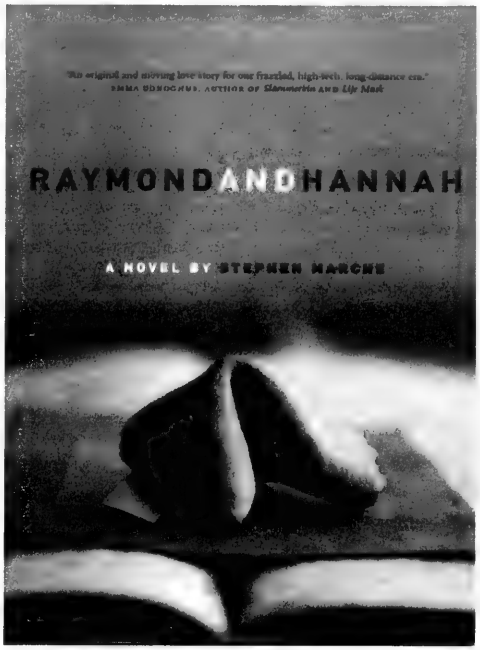
Hannah, who is Jewish, is travelling to a yeshiva in Jerusalem for nine months to explore her Jewish roots and figure out what being Jewish means to an "almost assimilated" Jew like her. Raymond, who isn't Jewish, is staying in Toronto to finish up his doctoral thesis on The Anatomy of Melancholy, an opus by Robert Burton.

Besides juxtaposing two engrossing texts, Marche structures Raymond and Hannah with a talmudic layout containing notes at the side. The overall effect is one that is stylistically unusual but that remains fast paced and well written.

The notes in the margin are meant "to get at the sensuality of physical text so that the layout of the page would draw in the reader," Marche said in an interview.

While Hannah immerses herself in the Talmud, Pirkei Avot, and resolving her guilt over her non-Jewish boyfriend, Raymond busies himself with Burton's 17th-century philosophical collection of quotes and references, and a relationship with another woman.

Marche, whose short story Garrison Creek was shortlisted for the 2002 O. Henry Prize in the United States, maintains that his characters aren't biographical. However, he does admit to drawing somewhat on his own experiences. Like Raymond, Marche is a doctoral student at the University of Toronto. In 1997, Marche met Sarah Fulford, who, like Hannah, went to study in Jerusalem. They have since gotten married.



But Marche, who is himself 28, maintains that Raymond and Hannah are fictional characters who stand on their own. "Otherwise they would be total failures," he said.

In Marche's novel, the characters represent what Toronto is about, a liberal, pluralistic, but hollow and cold city that brings diverse people together but constantly prompts them to search elsewhere for their heritage and traditions. It is the complexity of this dichotomy that motivates the characters. Hannah is in Jerusalem at an Orthodox yeshiva to celebrate Jewish learning and continuity. But she is in love with Raymond, a non-Jewish boy.

At one point, Marche writes that "Hannah keeps Raymond's existence to herself… She doesn't mention that at the moment, while they are on vacation from their yeshiva, a goyish week-long stand may well be sitting down to write her."

Later, when Raymond comes to visit her in Jerusalem, Hannah thinks, "This man beside me simply cannot know where he stands, where he walks, what he smells, the tastes, the calls, the web of messages said but not spoken."

According to Hannah, Raymond will never understand the importance that Jewish heritage means to her. How could he?

And yet Marche explains that the characters don't turn away from the complexity.

"It is happening all around yet people deal with and learn to live with these kinds of contradictions quite well," Marche said.

The book, which in many ways captures the most perplexing of modern Jewish challenges, is revealing in its honesty and a must-read for those who want to truly understand this contemporary generation.

SUPER CELEBRATION: Just weeks after the New England Patriots won the Super Bowl, Patriots owner Robert Kraft, pictured holding the NFL's Vince Lombardi Championship Trophy, attended the grand re-opening of the Kraft Family Stadium in Jerusalem. Kraft, who in 1999 donated the initial funds to the Jerusalem Foundation to build Israel's only American football facility, donated an additional $500,000 this winter for a new state-of-the-art synthetic sports surface, produced by the Canadian firm Fieldturf. "Since beginning to invest in Israel just over three years ago, the New England Patriots have won the Super Bowl three times. I don't think that's a coincidence," Kraft said at the ceremony, attended by thousands of enthusiastic sports fans. Also pictures are celebrations at the event by youngsters from some of the 70 football teams who play at the stadium. [IPS photos courtesy of the Jerusalem Foundation] has helped expose the team's many weaknesses and put them in position to develop better team chemistry. At the same time, Perron's knowledge of the game and his no-nonsense approach has seen the team improve greatly, particularly on the power play, in short-handed situations and on face-offs, said Bull, a native of Kibbutz Shamir.

The Israelis are also learning, many for the first time, how to play proper positional hockey, said Bull, whose mother is Lori Short of Toronto

Perron has explained that to succeed "we will need to play the trap," he said.

Oren Zamir, another tall, muscular centre who is expected to lead the Israelis, said the team has made tremendous strides in just 10 days together. Zamir, who plays for the Notre Dame Hounds in Wilcox, Sask., said a highlight of the trip took place in Los Angeles where organizers arranged for LA Kings' coaching staff to instruct the Israelis.

Raviv Bull

For Perron, teaching the Israeli kids is also a unique hockey experience. They're eager to learn and they are very determined, he said.

"We're getting better. I'm losing my voice, so we must be getting better.

"There's no question, the team is gelling. Every night we see the group getting more and more together, playing better defensively. Offensively, we're just average, so we have to play better defensively," he said.

Despite being coached by Russian expats back in Israel, the Israelis "don't want the Russian style, they want the Canadian style," Perron stated. "They receive a check, they give a check. They're not scared at all."

Bull agrees. Back in Israel, the boys generally play with adults, "and adults hit us, so we have to hit back. Israelis are naturally aggressive. We don't hit for fun, but if somebody hits us we hit back, and they should know it."

Though improving the Israelis' skill level is a big part of their annual venture to Toronto (this is the fourth winter in a row they've come), creating close ties to the local community is another important aspect of the trip, said Moshe Eizenman, one of the event organizers.

During their visit, the Israelis traditionally visit local day schools and on this occasion, they also visited a public school. "It provides kids here with another glimpse of Israel. Israel is not just a country at war," he said.

Jean Perron

This year they met with students from United Synagogue Day Schools, Richmond Hill, and Associated Hebrew Schools' Finch branch, as well as Willow Wood School.

Steven Maislin, Canadian chair of the 2005 visit, said the Israelis are billeted with local families and organizers were faced with more volunteer families than there were boys to accommodate. The visit creates "unbelievable camaraderie," said Maislin.

Fundraising for the team is another important aspect of their tour, and this year "we hope to raise $50,000 from friends, family, ticket sales and sponsors," he said.

About 1,000 spectators at Herb Carnegie Arena watched the Israelis defeat the Forest Hill Minor Midgets, the winner of the B'nai Brith Classic tournament, by a score of 8-3. The Israelis later faced off against Forest Hill Midget Selects (that game ended 4-4 when Forest Hill pulled its goalie and scored with 36 seconds left), and they played the Community Hebrew Academy of Richmond Hill on their last day in Toronto.

Alex Voihanski, director of B'nai Brith sports, said four teams competed for the right to play the Israelis in the B'nai Brith Classic, but the event is proving so popular, he's already received inquiries from other teams about next year's tournament. They may be as many as eight or 10 teams in next year's Classic, he said.

Meanwhile, efforts are underway to erect a new sports complex in central Israel that will expose the game of hockey to thousands of new youngsters, said Alan Maislin, chair of the Israel Ice Hockey Federation.

Oren Zamir

Maislin, whose family once owned a piece of the Montreal Canadiens, said private interests are close to announcing a plan to construct the complex near Tel Aviv. It would operate on a for-profit basis in co-operation with Israeli authorities. Negotiations are under way with the Ministries of Sports and Education for their co-operation in employing the facility for recreation and sports activities.

Maislin, who is widely credited with bringing NHLers into the Israeli hockey program, said former Buffalo Sabres coach Ted Nolan has agreed to coach the Israeli senior hockey team and he will join Perron, Ken Hitchcock, Mike Keenan and perhaps Pierre Page at a hockey camp in Metulla this summer.

The Canada Centre rink will also host a friendly tournament in early May for players over 35 years of age, he added.

OHL team-owner Bassin backs Israeli hockey

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Sherwood "Sherry" Bassin's Russian-born father didn't particularly appreciate his son's preoccupation with the game of hockey. Seen through an immigrant's eyes, the sport didn't make much sense and so the elder Bassin would tell Sherry in no uncertain terms, "hockey, shmockey, you're going to school."

Heeding his father's advice, Bassin did indeed go to school, earning degrees in pharmacy, law and hospital administration. But he never did quench his thirst for hockey. Moving to eastern Canada, Bassin would fashion a Hall of Fame-like career in junior hockey, coaching winning Memorial Cups, earning two gold medals as a coach and general manager of Canada's national junior team, and investing in his own OHL team, the Erie Otters, one of the more successful franchises in the league.

Along the way, he would generate no shortage of controversy, trading budding junior phenom Eric Lindros from the Sault Ste. Marie Greyhounds for a passel of players who would ensure the team's success for years to come. He would reprise that effort in later years as assistant general manager for the Quebec Nordiques, helping arrange the trade of the reluctant superstar to Philadelphia for a core of players that would help the team win the Stanley Cup after they moved to Colorado.

More recently, Bassin has lent his name, his expertise and his passion for the sport to the development of hockey in Israel. A member of the board of the Israel Ice Hockey Federation, Bassin's name also graced the cup awarded to the Israeli under-18 juniors after their 8-3 win last week over a local Jewish team in a B'nai Brith sponsored match.

In presenting the cup, Bassin wore his emotions on his sleeve when he told the audience of about 1,000 that "everybody who's Jewish identifies with that Israeli sweater."

It was a moment he could hardly have imagined when as a boy, he sat beside his father, listening on the radio as the United Nations General Assembly voted for the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine.

For Bassin, the opportunity of linking his passion for hockey and his love of Israel was too good to pass up. When local Israeli hockey supporter Moshe Eizenman asked for his help, he jumped at the offer.

Bassin will travel to Israel this summer and participate in a hockey camp at the Canada Centre in Metulla. He'll join Israeli junior team coach Jean Perron, Florida Panthers GM Mike Keenan and Philadelphia Flyers coach Ken Hitchcock, who will run the camp and evaluate players.

Back in Canada, Bassin will participate in formulating a long-term development plan aimed at improving the hockey program in Israel while enticing young players.

"I expect to have a hands-on role in the development of Israeli hockey," Bassin said last week. That process will include setting up a formal program, training coaches and finding the funds to subsidize what is an expensive sport compared to the alternatives, like soccer.

Currently, the board is still formulating its overall concept for Israeli hockey and Bassin acknowledges much will depend on whether a new rink is constructed near Tel Aviv, close to the country's population centre.

The hockey program in the two rinks in Canada Centre attracts about 100 youngsters and this group forms the nucleus of the current junior program.

A second facility could potentially attract enough kids to form elite and recreational teams, he said.

Bassin is confident hockey will succeed in Israel.

"My comment is, whatever the Israelis do, they'll do well. They're pretty determined."

Bassin is pleased to be associated with hockey in Israel. It's something even his dad would have approved.

"It would've been a special moment for him to see the Israeli hockey team," he said.

Down the red carpet of courage

I pushed my way through the Toronto reporters, who resembled Hollywood paparazzi, and turned back to watch the strongest and most loving woman I have ever met walk through the revolving glass doors of the courthouse on University Avenue.

The moment she entered the crisp February air, the camera bulbs flashed repeatedly and microphones were shoved at her from all directions. I was reminded of the days when I lived in Los Angeles and attended movie premieres. The media would wait for celebrities to walk down the red carpet and start frantically clicking their cameras and begging for interviews.

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

Some of the movie stars would smile, pose, and answer questions, while others preferred to be left alone. However, these actors made the choice to work in the film and television industry. They knowingly went into a business that constantly puts them on the news, in the papers and in countless magazines.

I do not approve of the paparazzi ethics in Hollywood, the lengths they go to in order to get a story and the way they stalk their unknowing prey who may be on vacation or enjoying a private dinner with a loved one. But I am thoroughly disgusted with the way some media deal with victims of crime in Toronto. They are disrespectful and hurtful, and they have no compassion for the pain and suffering the families they are photographing are going through. How many times have victims being aggressively surrounded by reporters in similar situations?

That day, the woman exiting the courtroom surrounded by her family and friends was my boyfriend's sister. She is not an actor and she does not work in the film and television industry. She is a woman whose husband was murdered 2½ years ago. But the harassing photographers didn't seem to care – they just wanted their photos, without any regard for the traumatic effect their actions caused.

As a writer, I am trying to come to grips with the fact that photojournalists are doing their job and have to get their story and photos. But is it really necessary to run after and swarm a subject repeatedly as they hurry to their car? And no one asked the children, the youngest of whom is only 11, if they wanted their image plastered all over the news that night and in major newspapers the following day. How many times have we seen innocent young children on the news and in the paper? Do victims not have the right to privacy? Have they not been through enough already?

I believe there should be rules and guidelines that the media should enforce when dealing with victims of crime. Ethical standards should fall into place naturally, and if they're not followed, then those who work in the media should face repercussions. Most importantly, people's privacy should be respected.

But despite the unfortunate situation and circumstances, the woman I am writing about handled herself like the remarkable woman she is – with grace, compassion, courage and a strength I have rarely encountered in my life. She is a beautiful woman inside and out, and she raises her six children with love and kindness.

I remember how nervous I was the first time I went to meet the family. There were so many nieces and nephews – how was I supposed to remember all their names? But she welcomed me into her home for Shabbat dinner – and many since then – and I was immediately comfortable in her presence. As we lit Shabbat candles, I felt her strong spirituality and compassion for the world and all those around her.

Despite the sadness and loss she must experience, her smile lights up a room brighter than the flashes of the photographer's cameras. Her sensitivity toward humankind is contagious – and a character trait well worth adopting by writers and photographers who work to bring us truth through the media.

PURIM PINWHEELS

1/4 lb. butter or margarine
3/4 cup sugar
1 egg
1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
1/4 tsp. almond extract
1 3/4 cup flour
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1 oz. unsweetened chocolate, melted
2 tblsps. poppy seeds

Cream butter and sugar until light in processor. Add egg, vanilla and almond extracts and blend well. In separate bowl, combine flour, baking powder and salt. Add flour mixture to butter mixture and blend thoroughly. Divide dough in half. Beat melted chocolate into one half of dough, and poppy seeds into remaining half. Wrap each half with plastic wrap and refrigerate until firm.

On floured wax paper, roll out each half dough to a 9"x14" rectangle. Invert white poppy seed dough onto chocolate dough and peel off wax paper from white dough. Tightly roll up dough, jelly-roll fashion, peeling off wax paper as you roll. Wrap the roll with plastic wrap and refrigerate at least 1 hr., or freeze until needed.

Preheat oven 350°F. Carefully cut roll into 1/4" thick slices. Place slices on ungreased foil-lined baking sheets and bake for 5-7 mins. or until lightly browned. Transfer to racks to cool.

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

Gertrude Belle Elion (1918-1999) spent 60 years researching and helping defeat some of humankind's deadliest diseases. In 1988, Elion shared the Nobel Prize in physiology-medicine with Dr. George Hitchings and Sir James Black. She was only the fifth female Nobel laureate in medicine.

Elion was born in New York City of immigrant parents from eastern Europe.

She was inspired to seek a career in medical research when, at 15, her beloved grandfather wasted away from cancer and died.

"In the hope that I could do something to combat disease, I decided to become a scientist," she wrote in her autobiography.

Because she was a woman, she could not find work in a laboratory, but after searching for a year and a half, she was hired for $20 a week as an assistant in a biochemistry laboratory.

Simultaneously, she studied for a master's degree in chemistry and graduated in 1941 with the highest honours.

She still found it difficult to find an appropriate position because of her gender, but World War II opened positions for women previously denied them.

Gertrude Belle Elion

Elion's career in medical research began in 1944 when a pharmaceutical company hired her for $50 a week.

She and her research partners learned how to block the replication of cancerous cells and infectious microbes without doing damage to normal cells. They developed "target specific" drugs. Her team developed cancer treatments that achieved remission in 40 per cent of children with leukemia.

In 1957, the team developed a drug that suppressed the immune system, helping the body to accept transplanted organs.

Drugs developed by Elion and Hitchings include acyclovir for herpes, azathioprine to help prevent rejection of transplanted organs and to treat severe rheumatoid arthritis, allopurinol to treat gout, pyrimethamine to fight malaria, and trimethoprim to combat bacterial infections.

In 1991, she received two exceptional honours: President George Bush, the current president's father, presented her with a national medal of science, and she became the first woman to be inducted into the Inventors Hall of Fame.

If the media were human

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

If the media were human, it would likely have few friends. I write this having dealt extensively with the media following David Rosenzweig's murder.

For weeks after the killing, the media labelled and branded – in every way but objectively – Christopher McBride, the murderer, a skinhead (which he was not). They also stated freely David's place of work and referred to him incorrectly as a Chassid – a haphazard reference to David's religious commitment. It was hodgepodge journalism, with no quest for the truth.

URBAN WRITER

But more disturbing than the reporters was the recklessness of the photojournalists and the media's decision to place pictures anywhere they saw fit, regardless of the effect it might have on the family or their safety.

On the day following the murder of her husband, prior to the funeral, journalists called my sister at home for interviews and to request a picture of David. Chavi stated categorically that a picture would not be forthcoming, feeling it would compromise her children's safety. A reporter then hunted one down, posted it on the front page of the newspaper and every other media outlet followed suit – without permission, without caring about the ramifications.

Cold media practices continued to distress our family. Newspapers regularly positioned McBride's face next to David's. Did the editors consider for a moment the pain the Rosenzweigs might experience seeing such an unsettling layout of the victim and the killer?

Following McBride's guilty plea last month, Chavi and her family exited the courtroom and were immediately swarmed by a mob of cameramen, showing the sleazy insensitivity of paparazzi more than the professionalism of photojournalists.

She was almost pushed into the snow by the frenzied rabble, and her son, Ezra, had to fend off flashing cameras just inches from his mother's face. Another son Yechiel, 11, appeared on the news that night – no permission requested.

A week later, after the sentencing, I asked the media to stand back as we exited the courtroom. Once again, they ignored my pleas and flashed away. A reporter, who sensed our obvious panic, told us we were on public property and would be charged with assault if we touched a photographer. The next day, Chavi and another one of her sons were on page 2. Are they public property?

If you don't have to interact with the media, don't. Journalists generally approach articles with predetermined assumptions, knowing how they want them to read. Most cameramen don't see you through their lenses. They see a paycheque. The best picture wins.

Furthermore, know there is little recourse when you are misquoted by a reporter or harassed by photographers. Following the instances outside the courtroom, I phoned numerous media outlets to complain. I heard back from one. If you are lucky enough to secure an apology for an unkind picture or misquote, it will likely appear buried somewhere in the newspaper.

My advice to the media is to hold focus groups with families who have lost loved ones to violence. Ask them what it was like to be continually misquoted and have cameras thrust in their face. I believe my sister calls this bullying.

The Ontario Press Council needs to create or enforce a code of ethics that reflects a humane way of dealing with the public, especially victims of violent crimes.

If you are a victim of a crime, know that the media are not your ally. There is a good chance you will be treated disrespectfully and left to the devices of writers and camera boys who have forgotten the meaning of professional ethics and human decency – kind of like people who don't have friends.

Expanding freedoms is a critical test for Abbas

By NATAN SHARANSKY
Special to The CJN

Opinion

Albert Einstein once said that insanity is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting to achieve a different result. We may want to keep this observation in mind when thinking about whether the recently elected Palestinian Authority government presents a new hope for peace.

Certainly, the diplomatic "music" coming out of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' PA is very different from that of former president Yasser Arafat's. Abbas, at least, speaks of a ceasefire with Israel, while Arafat egged on holy war through terrorism.

Nevertheless, Abbas' reticence to take on and disarm Palestinian terrorist factions is deeply worrying, as is his pledge to leading terrorists that he will protect them from Israeli reprisals. Israelis paid with their lives recently in yet another terrorist bombing because of Abbas' hesitance in taking concrete action against armed militants.

Moreover, Abbas has yet to take any significant steps to expanding freedom within Palestinian society – which, in my view, is the critical test for his administration.

'The first thing I saw was hell'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Nightclub hostess Liron Ifrah was getting ready for a busy shift when she noticed something that demanded her immediate attention. She had a run in her nylons, and judging by the clock on the wall, she had barely a few minutes to tend to it. It was almost 11:30 p.m. and customers were clamouring at the door, urging her to let them in.

"Wait five minutes and I'll be back," she told them as she rushed upstairs to a gallery overlooking the platform that gave the Tel Aviv nightclub its name – The Stage.

Her boss, who was meeting with the rest of the staff in the gallery, wondered what was going on. "Why aren't you downstairs getting ready to open and let in the customers?" he asked.

"I just need a minute," she replied. At virtually the same moment, the 15 waiters, bartenders and cooks of The Stage heard a strange, loud sound.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Minister Off to Israel

MONTREAL — Federal transport Minister Jean Lapierre will be in Israel March 13-20 to represent Canada at the opening of a new building at Yad Vashem and to study Israeli security systems. Lapierre told Sephardi community leaders in Montreal last week that Canada has been naive about security for too long, and the Americans may close the border as a result. As a leader in security, Israel can teach Canada how to make improvements here, he added.

Anti-Semitism Noted

WASHINGTON — Canada has experienced problems with a rise in anti-Semitic acts, the U.S. State Department said last week in its annual Country Reports on Human Rights Practices. The report said B'nai Brith Canada received almost 600 reports of anti-Semitic acts in the first eight months of 2004, versus 584 for all of 2003. As examples, it noted the firebombing of a library at United Talmud Torahs in Montreal, as well as vandalism at a Quebec City cemetery and a Toronto-area synagogue. Other human rights issues in Canada, including police brutality and the treatment of aboriginals, were also cited.

Jewish Poverty Rising

HAMILTON — The number of Jewish poor in Hamilton is rising steadily, with 17 per cent of local Jews living below the poverty line – higher than the Jewish national average of about 13 per cent, according to new data obtained by the Jewish Federation of Hamilton. The numbers, derived from a United Israel Appeal Federations Canada study of the 2001 census, show 795 Hamilton Jews, out of a total of 4,675, live in poverty. The Hamilton average is 20 per cent, Carol Krames, director of the city's Jewish Social Services, wrote in the Hamilton Jewish News.

WORLD

Citizenship Stripped

DETROIT — A U.S. Judge has stripped a former Nazi concentration camp guard of his U.S. citizenship. The ruling said that Iwan Mandycz, 85, was an armed guard at the Poniatowa labour camp in Poland in 1943 and later served in Sachsenhausen in Germany. Mandycz, who became a citizen in 1955 and has lived in the Detroit area ever since, concealed his Nazi collaboration when he applied to immigrate to the United States in 1949. The U.S. Justice Department's Nazi-hunting unit, the Office of Special Investigations, brought the lawsuit against Mandycz, who can appeal.

Demjanjuk in Court

CLEVELAND — Nazi concentration camp guard John Demjanjuk made a rare public appearance in court last week as his lawyer argued for a delay in the U.S. government's efforts to deport him. His next deportation hearing was set for June 30. He served as an SS guard at the Sobibor, Majdanek and Flossenburg camps in World War II. A judge stripped the Ukrainian-born Demjanjuk of his citizenship in 2002, ruling he lied and hid his past as a camp guard to gain U.S. citizenship. In April, a judge affirmed the ruling. Demjanjuk, who lives near Cleveland, was acquitted in Israel in 1993 of being the notorious Nazi guard "Ivan the Terrible," but he has been unable to refute evidence he was a Nazi guard.

Probation for Hate

BERLIN — A neo-Nazi politician in Germany who said last year that the Talmud condones sex with children recently has received three years probation for anti-Semitic agitation. Prosecutors wanted an 18-month jail term for Claus Cremer, deputy chair of the North Rhine-Westphalia branch of the National Democratic Party of Germany, but the court chose probation.

Papon Appeal Denied

PARIS — A French court has rejected an appeal by Maurice Papon, who was fined for wearing a prestigious French service award. Papon was stripped of his decorations after being convicted of Nazi-era crimes. Now 94, he was sentenced in 1998 to 10 years for his role in the deportation of Jews from France to Nazi death camps in 1942, when he was a Vichy France official. In 2002, he was released from jail on medical grounds.

Comic Attacked

PARIS — Four Israelis are suspected of attacking a French comedian known for making anti-Semitic statements. Dieudonne M'Bala M'Bala was assaulted last week while talking to reporters on the French island of Martinique, a day after the High Court of Appeals in Paris condemned his "obsessive anti-Semitism." The Israeli Embassy said it would not be involved in the case because the suspects are also French nationals.

Canadian Mulls Bid for Bank Leumi

Gerald Schwartz

TEL AVIV — Sources in Israel close to Onex Corp. chair and CEO Gerald Schwartz say he plans to visit in May to tender an offer for the state's estimated 20 per cent holding in Bank Leumi and make other investments, all in conjunction with Israel Aircraft Industries, Globes business newspaper reported last week.

He also reportedly plans to launch two major philanthropic projects during the visit.

The Canadian billionaire, who previously has had limited business dealings in Israel, pulled out of a bid last year to buy the state's controlling interest in the Israel Discount Bank, the country's third-largest bank. It ultimately went to a consortium led by fellow Canadian Matthew Bronfman.

The state's holdings in Bank Leumi – Israel's second-largest bank and the last whose controlling interest is held by the state, following government sales of stakes in Mizrahi and Hapoalim – are worth at least $800 million (US), based on the recent sale of 10 per cent of the government's shares to the Israeli branch of Deutsche Bank for about $400 million.

Murdered reporter's father promotes East-West links

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The father of slain American foreign correspondent Daniel Pearl brought a message of hope and defiance to Toronto last week.

Judea Pearl, a professor of computer science and statistics at the University of California in Los Angeles, said his son's brutal murder three years ago broke his heart.

But he said Daniel's death, at the hands of Islamic radicals in Karachi, Pakistan, has infused him with the faith to fight terrorism and hatred while building bridges linking East and West.

Pearl, a native Israeli, is the president of the Daniel Pearl Foundation. It was formed by the late journalist's family and friends to promote interfaith understanding through such projects as peace concerts, public dialogues between Jews and Muslims, and fellowships for Pakistani reporters in the United States.

These projects are supported by millions of people, he said in a talk at Beth Tikvah Synagogue sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto and the Beth Tikvah Jewish Education Centre.

Pearl was also here to promote I Am Jewish: Personal Reflections Inspired by the Last Words of Daniel Pearl, a collection of essays he edited that was written by Jewish personalities ranging from Israeli politician Shimon Peres to New York Times foreign affairs columnist Thomas Friedman.

Judea Pearl

Before he was beheaded, Daniel Pearl, a 38-year-old reporter on the staff of the Wall Street Journal, was videotaped saying, "My father is Jewish, my mother is Jewish, I am Jewish."

Pearl, whose family was among the founding fathers of Tel Aviv's Bnei Brak Orthodox neighbourhood, said his son's last words were underpinned by pride in being Jewish.

Judaism was a source of strength for him during Daniel's brief life and during his final moments in captivity, said Pearl, a graduate of the Technion.

Describing his son as a fair and objective journalist whose resiliency was his strength, Pearl said the phrase "I am Jewish" could be interpreted to mean he had a right to be different.

After relating how his father left eastern Europe to buy land in Palestine, Pearl said Jews are the world's biggest "exporter" of tolerance and freedom.

He urged Jews to reach out to others in the spirit of conciliation.

Declaring himself to stand for sanity, decency and courage, Pearl said he regards I Am Jewish as a weapon against hatred in the post-Sept. 11 era.

In a question-and-answer session, Pearl accused the Qatar-based Al Jazeera satellite news station of promoting anger – a component of terrorism – among Muslims.

He compared this anger to combustible fuel that can easily be set alight.

Al Jazeera should be held responsible for the violence this anger produces in the Arab world, he said.

Pearl likened anti-Zionism to racism because it denies the Jewish people's right to self-determination in "a sliver of land" called Israel.

"It's an attack on our historical identity," he said of anti-Zionism.

Jewish university students are currently being subjected to a vicious form of anti-Zionism, Pearl observed. He hailed these students as heroes.

Pearl said Jews and Muslims should together combat Islamophobia and anti-Zionism.

Turning to the Arab-Israeli conflict, he said the real test for the Palestinians is whether they truly accept Israel, which he likened to a postage stamp.

Taking solace from a recent survey, he claimed 54 per cent of Palestinians are now willing to accept a sovereign Jewish state without demanding a "right of return."

Pearl suggested a two-state solution seems to be in fashion today.

Sharansky's democracy watch

From the editor's desk

There is a compelling proverb in our literature that says, roughly translated, "Prophets are seldom recognized in their own communities." (Ein navih b'iroh.)

I am reluctant to characterize Natan Sharansky as biblical prophet. However, there is a sense in which the proverb, at least, if not the title, does apply to him these days.

As is widely known, the minister for Jerusalem and Diaspora affairs in Ariel Sharon's government, along with journalist Ron Dermer, recently co-wrote The Case For Democracy: The Power of Freedom to Overcome Tyranny and Terror.

The book is an impassioned but closely reasoned plea to western governments to help foster, if not demand, the building of the infrastructures of free, democratic governments throughout the Middle East. The surest guarantor for long-lasting peace and economic prosperity in the region, Sharansky argues, is the flowering of democracy.

U.S. President George W. Bush is the book's most famous booster. He recently told the New York Times that Sharansky's theories were part of his "presidential DNA." Bush has quite literally embraced both the book and its author. Merely one week after the president won re-election last November, the two men spent more than an hour together in the Oval Office discussing the book's rather large themes.

Because he was in the United States on a promotional tour of the book, the meeting with the president was especially fortuitous for the Israeli cabinet minister. Sharansky was not reluctant to disclose some of what had been discussed in the Oval Office.

As widely reported in the American media, Sharansky told the president: "There is a great difference between politicians and dissidents. Politicians are focused on polls and the press. They are constantly making compromises. But dissidents focus on ideas. They have a message burning inside of them. They would stand up for their convictions no matter what the consequences…

"In spite of all the polls warning you that talking about spreading democracy in the Middle East might be a losing issue – despite all the critics and the resistance you faced — you kept talking about the importance of free societies and free elections. You kept explaining that democracy is for everybody. You kept saying that only democracy will truly pave the way to peace and security. You, Mr. President, are a dissident among the leaders of the free world."

So intertwined now in the minds of many American policy pundits are Sharansky's book and Bush's clarion calls for liberty and freedom, that some have taken to calling the president's foreign policy the Bush-Sharansky doctrine.

The remarkably smooth Iraqi election, the stirrings in Lebanon and the hints of stirrings in Egypt and even Saudi Arabia, it is safe to say, are all sequelae of the exercise of that doctrine.

Sharansky's influence in Washington, however, is greater than it is in Jerusalem. In fact, in his book, he refers to the prime minister's apparent skepticism about Sharansky's freedom theories applying in the Middle East.

Sharon's and others' skepticism, Sharansky said, was part of his motivation to write the book. His experiences in the Soviet Union, and the nine years in the gulag, convinced him of the profound soundness of his ideas.

"I was inspired to write this book," Sharansky told an American interviewer, "by those who are skeptical of the power of freedom to change the world. I felt that the arguments of these skeptics had to be answered.

"This skepticism is the same skepticism I heard a generation ago in the U.S.S.R. when few thought that a democratic transformation behind the iron curtain was possible. Just as the skeptics were wrong then, I am convinced they are wrong now about the possibility of freedom spreading to the Middle East."

Though Sharon may be skeptical about Sharansky's "freedom watch" policies, there need be no inconsistency between the two goals of trying to work with Mahmoud Abbas (Sharon's policy) and demanding he take the necessary steps to build a free Palestinian society (Sharansky's policy).

The CJN asked Sharansky to explain for our readers how the principles in The Case For Democracy apply to the Palestinian Authority.

We are honoured to publish his essay on page 1 of this week's issue.

Just last week, Sharansky urged Sharon to demand that Abbas stop the planned execution of Palestinians alleged to have "collaborated" with Israel.

"It is unacceptable that the PA demands the release of terrorists from our jails and we respond affirmatively because of the hope for an opening for peace, while at the very same time the PA is about to commit state executions of people accused of helping Israel thwart terror.

"It is impossible to build a peace process based in blood. Such a process can only be based on the goodwill of both sides… The execution of those individuals… is in direct contradiction to the gestures demanded of Israel, tramples human rights and with it any spark of hope for a better future in the Middle East," Sharansky wrote to his prime minister."

A prophet in Washington, however, may be only a cabinet minister in Jerusalem.

Zundel back in jail – this time in Germany

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel has traded one jail cell for another as a German judge ordered the neo-Nazi propagandist held in custody on charges of denying the Holocaust and inciting hatred.

According to news agencies, a judge remanded Zundel to a jail in the western German city of Mannheim last week. He is being held under a 2003 arrest warrant for decades of anti-Semitic activities, including repeated denials of the Holocaust, which is a crime in Germany. The allegations stem from his web site (www.zundelsite.org), which is available in Germany.

Zundel made no statement at the closed hearing in the city of Mannheim, court spokesman Ulrich Krehbiel told reporters.

The 65-year-old native of Germany was deported last week from Canada after spending two years in solitary confinement. He had been held on a certificate issued by two federal cabinet ministers, which deemed him a threat to national security. Zundel was deported to his native Germany only days after a Federal Court judge upheld the certificate and branded Zundel a threat to Canada.

His removal was hailed by Jewish organizations that had opposed Zundel for decades.

"This is a significant day for the Jewish community and for all those who treasure tolerance in a multicultural society," said Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress. "Zundel's departure demonstrates Canada's abhorrence for those who would propagate Holocaust denial and anti-Semitism. It brings closure to our efforts to bring this man to justice."

"One would be hard-pressed to find many Canadians who will be sad to see Zundel go," added Congress's Ontario chair, Joel Richler. "This man has been found to be a threat to national security. By his own admission, he is the 'guru' of the white supremacist movement. Canada's action in deporting him is, without question, the correct one."

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said "it's wonderful to see he's finally been deported. The problem is, his case highlights the problems of using the immigration system in cases like this."

Adler suggested Zundel "manipulated" the system to file one appeal after another. The immigration system provides numerous avenues to challenge court decisions while the criminal justice system, reserved for more serious cases, is much simpler and operates more quickly, he said.

"It's great [Zundel] is out, but it's terrible it took so long. We're unfortunately at the mercy of Zundel picking when and how he wants to leave."

(Prior to his removal, Zundel announced he would no longer contest the government's efforts to deport him.)

Adler's colleague at the Simon Wiesenthal's office in Los Angeles, Rabbi Abraham Cooper, said, "This long-delayed move comes as the civilized world commemorates the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Europe from the genocidal grip of Nazi Germany. But it also comes at a time when, as a result of the efforts of professional Holocaust deniers and anti-Semites, too many young people have come to doubt the horrific brutal reality of the Nazis' Final Solution that systematically murdered six million innocent Jews.

"We hope that Canada's move and Zundel's impending arrest will give pause among those in the Arab and Muslim world who have rushed to embrace the 'big lie' that Zundel and his ilk continue to peddle," Rabbi Cooper stated.

Meanwhile, Zundel's lawyers published a statement slamming the "largely secret proceeding" against their client.

"The Crown and the presiding judge met secretly throughout his case, in the absence of Mr. Zundel and his lawyers. The Crown repeatedly presented evidence and made arguments to the judge in a Star Chamber-type proceeding," said lawyers Peter Lindsay and Chi-Kun Shi.

"At the public proceeding, Mr. Zundel was told literally hundreds of times, when he asked for specific evidence of the case against him, that there was 'nothing in the unclassified materials'. He was repeatedly blocked from asking questions of witnesses on the basis of 'national security'.

"Probably no one cares because Mr. Ernst Zundel is notorious and reviled. The powerful and the popular do not need to rely on the fairness of our legal system. The marginalized and the reviled do. Our system has failed Mr. Zundel. We should care. But we fear most of us don't give a damn," they stated.

UN-Israel situation has not changed: Bayefsky

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The United Nations is the "leading global purveyor of anti-Semitism today," according to Anne Bayefsky.

A human rights expert and York University professor now on leave as a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute, an American think-tank, she spoke at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) last week for the Aviva & Ronald Heller Memorial Lecture.

She said that on Jan. 24, to mark the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, hundreds of Jews and Israelis sang Hatikvah at the United Nations in the presence of UN secretary-general Kofi Annan. The breach of UN protocol – singing a national anthem – had been pre-approved, and many felt it marked "a turning point in the UN treatment of Israel and Israel's standing in the family of nations." Bayefsky did not.

Of 41 speeches delivered at the session, only five mentioned Israel, she said.

And on the same day in early January that Annan announced the holding of the commemorative session, he pushed forward a UN plan to create a register of the Palestinian victims of the security fence – a non-violent form of self-defence, noted Bayefsky. But, she added, there are no plans to create a register of Israeli victims of Palestinian terrorism.

Israel is often said to be the beneficiary of double standards, but nothing could be further from the truth, Bayefsky said. At the UN General Assembly last fall, she said there were 19 resolutions directed at Israel and only four criticizing the human rights records of the other 190 UN states.

The UN commission on human rights has adopted more resolutions condemning Israel than any other state, she said. The same commission has never adopted a resolution condemning human rights violations by China, Saudi Arabia, Syria or Zimbabwe. Petitions regarding abuses in places like Bahrain, Pakistan and the United Arab Emirates "have been dropped during closed-door sessions," she said.

In 2003, Israel tried unsuccessfully to put forward a resolution on the welfare of Israeli children, although the General Assembly annually adopts resolutions on the rights of all children, the rights of the girl child, and the rights of Palestinian children under Israeli occupation, she said.

For the last four decades, Bayefsky pointed out, the UN has been crafting a message of Israel as the leading racists of our time. "Discrimination against Israel at the UN has turned to demonization."

There is "an inextricable link" between discrimination and demonization of individual Jews and discrimination and demonization of the Jewish state, she noted.

Why was there no outcry, she asked, about Palestinians building bomb factories next to apartment buildings, launching rockets next to schools, or having summer camps that inspire children to become suicide bombers. "Why have liberal democracies been so easily manipulated?"

"Racist Israel" is "a constant refrain" at the UN, but "what is not said is that one-fifth of Israel's population is Arab and has greater democratic rights than in any Arab state."

Although the UN secretariat sponsored a meeting devoted to anti-Semitism last June, Bayefsky – who spoke there – said the audience consisted almost entirely of Jews and that there was no translation of proceedings despite the room being equipped for it. Also, she added, no documentation was produced and the UN refused to distribute the speeches.

Liberalism, she said, has become "the tool of the very forces it seeks to defeat."

She urged audience members to take the threat seriously. "What starts on university campuses ends up in houses of parliament… For far too long the name calling was dismissed by Israelis, just as Americans have tended to pay little heed to anti-Americanism in their midst.

"The demonization of the Jewish state is not a theoretical exercise," she said. "Apartheid is illegal. An 'apartheid' fence should be stalled, changed, removed. The killers on the other side understand that."

"Expose the hypocrisy," she exhorted. "Point to the egregious records of other UN states… Focusing attention on Israel diverts attention from other human rights victims the world over. Where is the outrage that the victims of the Nazis are victimized still?"

The UN has a "fundamental flaw," she said. "There are no democratic preconditions for membership.

Her last bit of advice had to do with changing the dynamic of anti-Semitism.

"A place like CHAT is important," she said. It connects students with the State of Israel and teaches them to recognize anti-Semitism when they see it, she explained. "They will go on to universities where they will encounter the ignorant, the intimidated and the bullies – both in the lecterns and the halls – who use human rights as a smokescreen and a weapon. But I believe they will respond much better than my generation and will become the intellectual, spiritual and political leaders that are in such short supply today."

During a question-and-answer session, Bayefsky suggested Jewish donors rethink the types of causes they contribute to at universities. Rather than funding chairs in Israeli or Jewish studies, which she believes ghettoizes Jews, she suggested thinking creatively about more general "institutions, chairs, centres that create a nexus in the university environment where our children can go, feel comfortable, be mentored and that will do appropriate outreach."

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is May 6th, 2005.

Low Income Families Together (LIFT) has begun offering a monthly dinner program for residents in the area of St. Jamestown, with support from Steeles Memorial Chapel, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and with the help of Hillel of Greater Toronto. Jewish groups support St. Jamestown dinner

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Len Rudner, acting national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, is regularly asked to comment on negative events, which is why he was delighted recently to speak out about something positive.

"So often, I'm in front of the camera when something is wrong. I'm happy to be here on a happy occasion. It's a tremendous feeling," Rudner said as he helped out at a community dinner at the Wellesley Community Centre for residents of St. Jamestown, near Wellesley and Parliament streets.

The seeds for the monthly dinner, which was inaugurated recently by Low Income Families Together (LIFT) with the assistance of CJC, Ontario region, were planted about a year ago when John Pollack, a member of Congress' community relations committee, approached Rudner about having Jewish groups work together to help develop such a program.

Food for the event is supplied through the support of Steeles Memorial Chapel, and volunteers are provided by Hillel of Greater Toronto.

"We became the matchmakers. When you bring many organizations together, you need someone to nudge the process along," Rudner said. "We wanted a program that people in the community can count on."

Members of LIFT, however, "are the real heroes," he added. "They run the program, and deal with the bureaucracy."

Josephine Grey, founder and chair of LIFT, moved into the neighbourhood about 18 years ago.

She organized the group with other single mothers at around that time, she said, so they could get together to support each other, reduce isolation, embrace diversity – St. Jamestown is one of the most diverse neighbourhoods in the world, she notes – and develop a resource centre.

The plan is to hold the dinner once a month, "until we can pick it up. We would like our own community to volunteer and contribute food, but this is a great way to get it rolling."

Many of the about 130 people who came for dinner are on a fixed income or earn low wages, she said. "Particularly at the end of the month, many of them run out of money, and there are no food programs in the area.

> 'It's about bringing people together and getting to know each other'

"The program is not just about food, however. It's about bringing people together and getting to know each other."

She would like to see the program run longer, from about 3 p.m. to 7 p.m. so participants can come in and connect with one another.

"I would also like to see some ethnic dinners, so we can represent various cultures. I figure there are about 160 languages spoken in the neighbourhood."

Paula Kates, who joined the LIFT board in 2000, co-ordinated the dinner. "This program is an important example of the positive things that can be done to help those in need when community organizations come together in a creative way. We could not have started this without the support of our partners."

Three years ago, she said, LIFT received funding to run a dinner in the Queen Street and University Avenue area for people with disabilities and the homeless. "I was delighted then, and it is no less of a joy for me today to see this program get off the ground."

Legitimate debate

The headline on the column that appeared in the Globe and Mail last week – "Israel's settlers are beyond democracy's frontiers" – was provocative and not accurately reflective of the column's content. But the essential message in the article written by former CJN columnist Shira Herzog was important and must be reinforced.

That message was simply this: the wide boundaries of free speech and broad debate within democracy – in this case, Israel's democracy – do not encompass the attempts to delegitimize the very democratic, lawful authority on which the government acts. Disagreement with the government's policies is very different from disagreement with the right of a duly elected government to enact its policies.

The former is the proper realm for debate, however heated. The latter is not. Indeed, it can be a road to disaster.

Herzog was very explicit. "For Jews committed to Israel's democracy, now's the time to… draw a line in the sand on the terms of a legitimate Jewish debate… (our emphasis). The campaign against its [the Israeli government] legitimacy has to be denounced," she wrote.

We agree with Herzog.

Protest that would lead to the abrogation of the law or to the denial of the authority of a duly elected government to enact law, is abhorrent. Thus, the call for soldiers to disobey orders en masse, for example, and the "Nazification" of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, his ministers and their policies, for another, are abhorrent. They are beyond the boundaries of proper political protest.

It is for this reason, we repeat and re-emphasize the words that appeared in this space last month. "We, the Diaspora supporters of the State of Israel… must do everything in our power...to ensure the paramountcy of the rule of law in that tiny country."

Condolences

All civil, law-abiding and rights-respecting societies owe a great debt to the police and other security officers who protect it against the thugs and criminals who would flout the rules in favour of their own brutish form of law and order. But only on rare occasions do we actually acknowledge that debt. The murder of four young RCMP officers last week in Mayerthorpe, Alta., was a shuddering and shocking reminder of how deep our debt actually is.

Constables Tony Gordon, Leo Johnston, Brock Myrol and Peter Schiemann were killed in the line of duty. That duty, we must always recall, was upholding Canadian law and in the process, protecting all of us who shelter under its wide umbrella.

We convey our profound condolences to the constables' families and friends. The debt we owe to the slain officers can only be "redeemed," if at all, by our respecting the democratic rules of the civil, law-abiding society that they died defending.

Zundel's lawyer criticized

Holocaust survivors, all Jews and all right-thinking people will passionately applaud Canada's removal of Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, one of the most despicable people to ever set foot in this country. I hope the German government will prosecute him to the full extent of the law and ensure that he spends his dying days in a barren German prison cell.

Lawyer Peter Lindsay disgraces the legal profession by stating that our system has failed Zundel ("Disbelief, if not outrage," CJN, March 3). Let him cite any other country where his client enjoyed the privilege of having been heard in the Superior Court of Ontario, the Ontario Court of Appeal, the Supreme Court of Canada, the Federal Court and the Federal Court of Appeal. Perhaps Lindsay's hurt will be somewhat soothed by thousands of dollars he reaped in legal fees, either from the earnings of Zundel as he peddled his poisonous garbage to fellow travellers around the world, or perhaps from legal aid, if Canadian taxpayers end up footing the bill.

I doubt Lindsay can look back over the past two years with much satisfaction for having defended the venom that Zundel spewed over his all-too-long stay in Canada.

Most Israelis against disengagement

I was shocked and confused when I read your paper of Feb. 24. In your editorial ("A very difficult period"), you state that "a large majority of the Israeli public supports the disengagement from Gaza and northern Samaria." That is complete nonsense and does not reflect the current situation in Israel.

There has never been a referendum in Israel to determine if there is national support for expelling Jews from there homes (mainly due to the fear of finding out there is no such support), nor has any poll indicated such a fact.

The majority of people who voted for Prime Minister Ariel Sharon held exactly the opposite opinion and would never have supported, and do not currently support, the expulsion of Jews from their homes.

Sharon has completely disregarded, abandoned and disassociated himself from all those who voted for him, but that does not mean that a reputable newspaper such as The CJN should abandon the truth and report fiction as fact. Why should The CJN also play a role in "disengaging" itself from a large section of the Israeli public? Please stick to the facts.

Contribution to the Arab Red Crescent

I was astounded that a considerable contribution has been made to the Arab Red Crescent on behalf of the Jewish community of Canada ("Pettigrew pledges unique Mideast role," CJN, Feb. 17).

It is a well-known fact that Arab ambulances have been used to transport suicide bombers and have caused untold death and misery to many Jews.

Should a private individual wish to aid the enemy in such a way, that's his business. But for such aid to be given in the name of an entire Jewish community, which was neither polled nor advised, is an insult to us and to the memories of the victims of murderous acts perpetrated by those to whom we are now providing aid.

Waiving fees and preserving dignity

Jean M. Gerber ("The cost of being Jewish," CJN, Feb. 17) points out that the Vancouver Jewish community is considering implementing a process called Central Assessment Mechanism (CAM), so that an individual seeking reduced or waived fees would apply once to a single authorizing body, and thus would be spared the agony of trying to obtain approval for assistance from each organization separately.

The CAM idea is one with considerable merit. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto should adopt such a mechanism in this city.

World ignores genocide in Sudan

By NORMAN L. EPSTEIN

When the tsunami swept the shores of Southeast Asia, a seismic wave of grief and generosity swept the world. People and governments around the world opened their hearts and wallets to the survivors and to assist in the rebuilding in the wake of the devastation.

In the span of a few minutes, nearly 200,000 people perished in the tsunami. It captured the imagination of the planet, and the relentless barrage of intense media coverage inspired many to give and act.

It was indeed heartening to see humanity at its best in one of the worst natural disasters in recorded history. However, it begs the question of why a natural disaster deservedly receives wide-scale attention, but a genocide in Sudan, generating a death toll well in excess of that of the tsunami, barely registers a ripple of attention.

The genocide, yet to be recognized as such by some, is being perpetrated by the government of Sudan and its proxy Arab militias, the Janjaweed, against African Muslims in Darfur – a region the size of France.

Sudanese government aircraft bomb African villages indiscriminately and then government troops and the militias storm the village, Many people are routinely tortured and summarily executed, children are abducted into slavery and women are raped. Human Rights Watch has found incontrovertible evidence that the upper echelons of the Khartoum regime are orchestrating these attacks.

Those fortunate enough to escape are exposed to famine and disease as their villages and crops are destroyed. Corpses, often those of babies and young children, are thrown into wells, to deny the survivors a source of fresh water.

Ninety per cent of African villages have been systematically destroyed in Darfur and more than two million people have been forcibly displaced.With the exception of 200,000 refugees who crossed into Chad, the survivors live in Internally Displaced Camps in Darfur surrounded by Sudanese government troops and Janjaweed. One writer likened these camps to an "African Auschwitz" or "a virtual prison without walls," where countless are dying every day.

The violence continues unabated and humanitarian aid cannot reach those in dire need because of lack of security. Aid workers are targeted for attack.

A recent authoritative, epidemiological study has conservatively estimated that 306,000 have died since February 2003, making lower statistics cited by the media obsolete. With access denied by the Sudanese government, we do not know the precise numbers. There are even reports that the government is "sanitizing" mass grave sites by burning the dead. The death toll will rise exponentially without determined action by the international community.

So I ask, again, why the difference in response to a natural disaster and to a preventable, man-made catastrophe?

In a word, politics.

The tsunami has remained largely apolitical. There are no sides – no victims and perpetrators, only the residue of nature's transient onslaught. There is no government policy to undermine, and there is virtually no strategic advantage for countries to exploit. Tsunami relief is provided outside the ineptitude and dysfunction of the United Nations – a highly charged political arena.

With the commemoration of the 60th anniversary of Auschwitz, and in the shadow of the Rwandan genocide, the international community under the auspices of the UN has stood paralyzed. The UN security council has passed weak and ineffectual resolutions trying to rein in the Sudanese government and its militias. These resolutions have consisted of hollow warnings, undefined measures and a mere hint of sanctions. The UN General Assembly has passed 22 resolutions, albeit non-binding, against the State of Israel, but not one against the nefarious regime in Sudan.

At the UN Human Rights Commission, a disproportionate number of resolutions rail against Israel's attempts to defend itself. As further insult, Sudan sits as a member of the commission judging Israel. It is akin to the fox guarding the henhouse.

The 23 countries of the Arab League and its allies defend Sudan at every turn. They say the conflict in Sudan is a manifestation of "African tribalism" and the Sudanese government should have more time to solve the crisis. They emphasize that Sudan's sovereignty should be respected.

But does not a sovereign nation lose its right to sovereignty when its government is orchestrating the murder of its own population?

China, Russia and France, who have vetoes in the UN Security Council, are all recipients of Sudanese oil. They threatened to use their vetoes unless resolutions were watered down. Clearly, allowing the flow of oil supersedes stemming the flow of blood.

The U.S. Congress – the Senate and House of Representatives – in an unprecedented 422-0 vote has called the situation in Darfur genocide. The George W. Bush Administration called it genocide after the return of an American investigating team. The European Union parliament in an overwhelming vote did the same. Canada did not.

So is it genocide?

The definition of genocide in the 1948 UN convention on the prevention and punishment of genocide refers to "acts committed with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group."

A UN team recently returned from Darfur and submitted a report to the Security Council. It reported crimes against humanity, including mass murder, torture, rape, wholesale destruction of livelihoods and war crimes. It went as far as to say these crimes are "as serious and heinous as genocide" and that "individuals" both within and outside the Sudanese government "have acted with genocidal intent."

The UN team compiled a list of 51 people who should be indicted and tried at the International Criminal Court. Despite this evidence, the commission fell short of calling the killing in Darfur genocide.

Do we need a smoking gun? Does the threshold have to be so high to need a Wannsee Conference (where the Nazis drew up their plans for extermination) to demonstrate indisputable evidence of genocide?

Does it really matter what you call it? On an intuitive level, it should not. These crimes are so unspeakable by whatever name, we should be morally compelled to act. However, calling the crimes genocide would make it impossible for the Security Council to invoke Chapter VII. That would force the UN to send peacekeepers to protect civilians, disarm the militias and ensure safe passage of humanitarian aid. A no-fly zone needs to be implemented to protect citizens from indiscriminate aerial bombings. It is morally reprehensible that these measures have not already been taken.

If the UN is unable to act as in previous genocides – Rwanda, Cambodia, Kosovo and Bosnia – then a multinational coalition outside the UN needs to be assembled, and fast. It could consist primarily of African Union troops, and would require immense help from NATO and the developed world. There is a precedent for acting outside the UN, such as when NATO intervened in Bosnia and Kosovo.

Can Canada play a vital role? Canada could be a key facilitator in energizing the international community to do the right thing – protect innocent civilians in Darfur. Prime Minister Paul Martin has made strong speeches at the UN, but he has to take bolder steps to put together a coalition that would intervene. Thousand of African lives hang in the balance.

What can the Jewish community do? Many Jewish organizations have proudly stepped up and many individuals have become activists. No one should underestimate the impact of writing to the prime minister, the Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew, foreign affairs critics, members of Parliament, or even requesting a meeting to discuss the issue with your MP (visit www.parl.gc.ca for addresses).

Politicians are more willing to take stands on issues when a significant number of constituents voice their concern.

It is unacceptable for us to say the world let the us down during the Holocaust if we are not willing to speak up forcefully for the silent victims of another genocide. Our painful legacy compels us to do so.

The tsunami should be a point of reflection. As a world community, we need to examine our success in responding to one type of disaster and our failure to act in another.

People have cited other reasons for the outpouring of tsunami relief. It is relative easy and safe for the media to report on post-tsunami destruction, but there is a lack of security in covering a war-ravaged region. Some say the world was stirred by the number of western lives lost.

Lt.-Gen. Roméo Dallaire, who led the UN Mission to Rwanda, proclaims that "all lives are equal." Are African lives just as cherished?

We have to ask other crucial questions. When will humanitarian interest trump a country's strategic interest? Was the tsunami response an aberration or are we really becoming a global village?

How can the UN, besieged by corruption, disarray and political expedience, serve as the final arbiter of justice and just action? Will Canada transform itself from a respected middle power to a moral superpower and seize international leadership?

When will we finally see the fiery inferno of genocide and act more quickly to douse the flames?

The flames in Darfur need to be extinguished now. If not now, then when? If not in Sudan, then where? If not by determination, then how? If we as humanity cannot, then why not?

Opinions

Maccabiah and continuity

While the Games of the inaugural Maccabiah, in 1932, lent validation to the emerging concept of a physically stronger Jewish people, any assumption that the persecution of Jews might be on the wane would soon be shown to be woefully premature. In 1935, the second Maccabi Games took place in a climate of escalating political turmoil in Europe, while the third Games, scheduled for 1938, were postponed as war became imminent.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

When reconvened in 1950, these Games were a bittersweet testament to both the tragedy, and the resilience, of Am Yisrael. On the one hand, there was cause for celebration since they were the first Games to be held in a newly independent State of Israel. Conversely, how could there be any elation in the wake of the catastrophe that that had so recently befallen world Jewry? Only 800 athletes from 17 countries participated, none of them from the previously large communities of central and eastern Europe that had been so dominant an influence during the first two Maccabiot.

The next Games were held in 1953 and, since then, there have been competitions every four years. Except for 2001, when numbers were down because of terrorism fears, attendance has increased with each successive Maccabiah.

Philosophically, the Maccabi Games are essentially about sport. But even more importantly, they are about Zionism and Jewish identity. A great deal has been said, and as much has been written, about the central issue of Jewish continuity in a Diaspora environment where assimilation is so common. And while programs such as Birthright have effectively begun to reconnect young Jews with Israel and with their Judaism, there are many other creative ways to achieve a similar end. One of these is the Maccabiah.

This year, Canada will be taking about 120 athletes who are juniors to the Games. For many of these teens, and likely also for a sizable number of young men and women in a slightly older age range, this will be their first visit to Israel. And it may well turn out to be the most impressionable of any trip they may ever make.

What awaits all of our team is an experience of a lifetime, a chance to compete, in a spirit of goodwill and sportsmanship, with Israelis and with fellow Jews from around the world. What also awaits team members, and especially our juniors, is a magnificently structured educational program that will expose them to the many facets of the social, cultural, historic and political mosaic of Israel. The hope, and the intent, is to bring back to Canada a group of young people who will have revitalized their commitment to their Jewish heritage and to their Zionism. Sport is merely the lens through which this broader picture will be framed.

On a visit to Auschwitz

Shoulders hunched, we huddled closely around the rabbi, trying to stay tolerably warm. The biting cold of Poland in a dead season was rendered all the more miserable by chill, penetrating vapours of cold sweat from the saturated earth beneath our feet. Tears from watchful eyes trickled down upon us from the slate grey sky over our heads in an incessant weeping that passed for drizzle. It was perfect weather. I would have had it no other way.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

At one point, I walked off a short distance to be alone with my thoughts. I wanted to contemplate in privacy, undisturbed and undistracted, the startling simplicity of absolute evil. The rabbi's words were inaudible, drowned out by the cacophony of the wind playing hysterically over the bare fingers of the leafless trees.

"Very industrial," I thought to myself examining the gigantic trough cut deep into the earth, keenly interested in the smallest details of everything I saw. I had done my homework in advance and I felt a strong desire to sort out to my intellectual satisfaction the functional parts of the giant killing machine. The grisly details surrounding the cold-hearted slaughter of human beings were disturbingly mesmerizing.

After a time, I summed up my observations: "A no-frills, well-designed, supremely efficient, first-rate extermination installation. Yep, hand it to the Germans!"

Then I remembered something I had once read, or had been told maybe, and bracing for what I might discover, I bent forward to scoop up a fistful of dirt. Studying the soil sample, my heart pounding in my chest, I was greatly relieved to have the rumour contradicted by my observations. There were only the brown clods of wet and lifeless earth laced with a few shreds of last year's withered grass. Curious, but the ordinariness of this too, as with so many other things in Poland, was somehow profoundly unacceptable.

Suddenly I heard him – panting, wheezing, groaning, as he stumbled over the twisted and rusting iron rods, navigating a course among the scattered hunks of blasted concrete. He was very old, and his progress was slow and unsure. It looked as though he might trip and fall at any moment, until, coming to a halt in front of a heap of battered things, he extracted a tiny, round memorial candle from his coat pocket and set it down upon a draughty, exposed perch.

What followed was an almost laughable spectacle. I watched in sorrow as the old man waged a futile campaign against the overwhelming powers of nature. His tiny candle, with its miniscule sputtering flame of remembrance, was swallowed up by the colossal desolation where once roaring furnaces immolated countless tons of human flesh. My sudden, choked laughter was driven by an uncontrollable grief and pity.

Unable to restrain myself, I walked over and set a hand upon his palsied shoulder. In silence, I fell to my knees at his side and began to prepare a small, protected berth behind a windbreak of assorted fragments of debris. He handed me a box of matches and I lit the candle. Then, without speaking, we two, intimate strangers, stood watching in triumph as that tiny candle gasped courageously, flickering with warm determination in the immense, engulfing oblivion of an indifferent world.

Eventually, a look on his face as sad and forlorn as ever I have seen, the old man turned to me and spoke. "Thank you, Sir, thank you so much. You see I come here every year, all the way to Poland from my home in Israel, to light a candle. Every single year. Never once have I failed to make the journey, and even now, in spite of my failing strength and despite the dreadful weather, I have come again. You see, I must come, for I was the only one. Only, me. There was never anybody else to do so.

And gazing into the gaping pit lined with crumbling concrete, as the winds howled, two lone, grief-stricken Jews in a faraway land, he gestured vaguely towards some exact spot he either thought he recognized or felt he needed to. After which he added: "Right over there, do you see? Down there. That, kind Sir, is where they destroyed my mother."

No ceasefire in the political war

For the first time in more than four years, there may be some basis for optimism in the Arab-Israeli conflict. The Sharm el Sheik summit produced more than the usual group photographs and led to the return of the Jordanian and Egyptian ambassadors to Israel. In addition, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and the post-Arafat Palestinian leadership appear to be serious about halting terror. While the words must be matched with deeds, and the complexities of real peace will take years to develop, this is tangible progress.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In sharp contrast, the political war against Israel is continuing and even expanding, reflecting the hatred and rejectionism that has driven this conflict for decades. The main shock troops in this political war – so-called "human rights" groups, the media and radical academics – are escalating the attacks against the legitimacy of Israel as a Jewish state. They are focal points of the new anti-Semitism, which seeks to deny Jews the right to sovereign equality in a world dominated by countries with Islamic and Christian frameworks.

In this dirty war, the "non-governmental organizations" (NGOs) often lead the attack, and they were central in the revival of the "Zionism is racism" campaign at the 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa. They also promoted the Jenin "massacre" and "war crimes" myths, and the attack on the "apartheid wall." These unregulated groups, funded by government aid donations, church organizations and private philanthropies, have not slowed their attacks.

Human Rights Watch, an active participant at Durban, is now pushing the anti-Israel boycott, and the World Council of Churches has called on its more than 300 member churches in 120 countries to divest from firms that help Israel in "illegal activities" in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Of course, in these propaganda and public relations campaigns, Palestinian terrorism and incitement are rarely, if ever, mentioned.

Similarly, Christian Aid – an ostensibly charitable organization based in London with an annual budget of more than $200 million (Cdn) – contributes to the war by placing costly newspaper advertisements attacking Israel's anti-terror separation barrier. Making absurd claims about Israeli responsibility for Palestinian poverty (again, no mention of Palestinian terror, or massive corruption), this activity follows a massive Christmas fundraising campaign featuring perennial Palestinian victims whose suffering is entirely blamed on Israeli aggression. "Bethlehem's Child" was an unsubtle manipulation of classical Christian anti-Semitic themes and another example of demonization aimed at ending the legitimacy of Israel as an independent Jewish homeland.

In this ongoing political battle, the media have played a key role in distorting Israeli policy and promoting Palestinian victimization. On this front, as well, there has been little noticeable change. In covering Israel's release of 500 Palestinians linked to terrorism, CNN and other media emphasized the suffering of their families and the heroes' welcome they received. For families of Israeli victims of terror, there was no such happy ending to show on TV.

And the BBC, whose anti-Israel slant is well-documented (at least one of its reporters admitted she shed tears over Arafat's death), recently broadcast a controversial "Thought for the Day" radio item by a Christian reverend. He claimed to have met a Palestinian Muslim conscript to the Israeli army who was jailed for refusing orders to shoot at "unarmed [Palestinian] schoolchildren." The BBC and the reverend were forced to apologize, saying there were errors in the story and no evidence to support it, but the incident reflects the depth of anti-Israel ideology.

On university campuses, there is also no sign of a ceasefire in the propaganda war to undermine Israel's legitimacy. At Columbia University in New York, for example, a very biased panel discussed the merits of a "single state solution" – meaning the destruction of the Jewish state and its replacement by another majority Arab state. In an effort to avoid charges of anti-Semitism, the organizers brought in one of the fringe Israeli academics who promote this propaganda. And the University of Toronto was the site of "Israel Apartheid Week," an unofficial staging ground for anti-Semitism that was permitted on the basis of free speech.

Taken together, these active fronts in the political war show that while terror attacks may have abated, the ideological campaign designed to prevent Israel from defending itself is being strengthened. For peace to have any chance, this full-scale attack must also be defeated.

The Kirshner File

Hezbollah plays a destabilizing role

In a remarkable confluence of views, Israeli and Palestinian officials recently accused Hezbollah of trying to disrupt Israel's fragile ceasefire with the Palestinians and assassinate the new president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A spokesperson for Hezbollah in Beirut hotly dismissed the accusation, claiming it was part of a disinformation campaign by Israel and the United States to discredit the Lebanese Islamic fundamentalist group, which is backed by Iran and Syria. But according to a top, but unnamed, PA official, Hezbollah agents in Lebanon have offered up to $100,000 (US) to any Palestinian willing to carry out a bombing in Israel, knowing full well that such an attack could undermine the truce agreed to by Abbas and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon at their Feb. 8 summit in Sharm al Sheikh, Egypt.

That Hezbollah is playing a destabilizing role in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is nothing new. Since Israel's hasty withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000 and the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising just four months later, Hezbollah has established close ties with certain Palestinian groups – namely Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Al Fatah and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade – and provided them with training, logistical support and funding. One wonders, therefore, whether Hezbollah had a hand in the Feb. 25 suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, for which Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility.

Late last year, Sharon told Newsweek magazine that close to 80 percent of all terrorist activity in the northern half of the West Bank was directed and financed by Hezbollah in league with Iran. Previously, Avi Dichter, the outgoing director of the Shin Bet, Israel's internal security agency, said Hezbollah – which has also targeted Americans in the Middle East – was behind the deaths of one-third of Israelis murdered in the intifadah in 2004.

What is also certain is that Hezbollah's deputy leader, Imad Mugniyah, was a key figure in the Karine A incident. In January 2002, Israeli naval commandos intercepted a ship attempting to smuggle 50 tons of weaponry and munitions to the Palestinians. Hezbollah bought the vessel and trained the Karine A's crew in scuba diving and preparing the floating tanks in which the cargo would be smuggled into the Gaza Strip.

Although Hezbollah apparently has not yet succeeded in forming its own cells in the territories, it has intensified efforts to establish a foothold there. It's also trying to gather intelligence through infiltrators carrying false European passports and disloyal Israeli Arabs, and to subsidize families of Palestinians killed or injured fighting Israel. Such is Hezbollah's profile in the territories that Ehud Ya'ari, the seasoned Israeli analyst, recently wrote, "Hezbollah has become the central player in Palestinian terror warfare."

In a concerted attempt to build a subversive beachhead in the West Bank and Gaza, Hezbollah has gone all out to smuggle "sleepers" into Israel and the territories, and to recruit Israeli Arabs.

Hussein Mikdad, a Lebanese Shiite accountant who worked for Sheikh Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, the spiritual leader of Hezbollah, entered Israel with a forged British passport in 1996. He blew himself up while building a bomb in his hotel room in eastern Jerusalem. Stefan Smirak, a German convert to Islam and Hezbollah member, was arrested in Israel in 1997 following a tip from Germany's intelligence service. Four years later, yet another Hezbollah agent – Gerard Shuman, a British citizen of Lebanese origin – was arrested at Ben-Gurion Airport. (Smirak and Shuman were subsequently repatriated to Lebanon in a prisoner swap).

Less than two months ago, a Lebanese-born Danish citizen affiliated with Hezbollah was arrested on a train bound from Nahariya to Haifa.

The first batch of Israeli Arabs charged with being Hezbollah spies, seven in number, were arrested in the western Galilee village of Abu Snan in November 2000. In June 2001, three Israeli Arabs from Yafi'a and Kfar Kanna were indicted for plotting to steal weapons from an Israeli army base and send information to Hezbollah. In September of that year, four Israeli Druze from Rama and Daliat al-Carmel were arrested after being caught smuggling weapons from Lebanon.

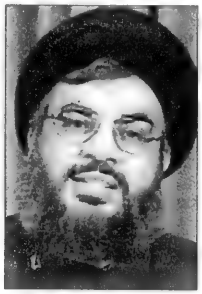
Last November, an Israeli Bedouin from Zarzir, a tracker in the army, was indicted on suspicion of making contact with Hezbollah. But in the most serious case of its kind, an Israeli Bedouin colonel in the army, Omar el-Heib, was arrested in 2002 as a Hezbollah spy.

Hezbollah has not limited itself to espionage. On March 17, 1992, a Hezbollah-rigged car bomb demolished Israel's embassy in Buenos Aires, killing 29 people and injuring 250. And on July 18, 1994, Hezbollah bombed a Jewish community centre in the heart of Buenos Aires, killing approximately 100 civilians. In both instances, Iran – which calls for Israel's destruction – was involved.

Another focus of Hezbollah's struggle against Israel is southern Lebanon, where Israel maintained a self-declared security zone from 1978 to 2000. Israel and Hezbollah waged a bitter guerrilla war there for years. When Israel pulled out of that mountainous enclave, Hezbollah's secretary-general, Hassan Nasrallah, claimed victory.

By evacuating southern Lebanon, Israel fully complied with United Nations Security Council Resolution 425, passed in 1978 after Operation Litani, Israel's first invasion of Lebanon. Nevertheless, Hezbollah stubbornly insists that Israel is illegally occupying Lebanese territory in the Shabaa Farms area. In fact, Shabaa Farms is on the Golan Heights, which Israel captured from Syria in the 1967 Six Day War.

Since October 2000, when Hezbollah ambushed an Israeli patrol near Har Dov, kidnapping and killing three Israeli soldiers, tensions have flared periodically in Shabaa Farms. Twenty-one Israelis – 16 soldiers, and five civilians – have been killed by Hezbollah in the past five years. In the last such incident, on Jan. 9, an officer was mortally wounded when his jeep hit an explosive device planted by Hezbollah.



Hassan Nasrallah

Shortly after the soldier's death, Israel shelled and bombed targets in Lebanon. Yet Israel's retaliation was quite measured. Hezbollah has an awesome arsenal of rockets and missiles, including SA-7 surface-to-air missiles and Fajr-5 surface-to-surface rockets, capable of reaching Haifa and Hadera.

Last November, in a small triumph of technology but in a major psychological blow, Hezbollah dispatched a drone into northern Israel. It was the first hostile aerial incursion from Lebanon since November 1987, when several members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine flew over in a hang glider and killed six Israeli soldiers.

Nasrallah boasted that the unmanned plane, manufactured in Iran, could bomb "any target, be it water or power plant, a military base or an airport."

He may have been engaging in hyperbole, but shortly after the penetration, the Israeli Air Force positioned a battery of Patriot anti-aircraft missiles in the Haifa Bay area to intercept Hezbollah-operated drones.

Hezbollah has created a balance of terror that Israel cannot ignore. As a result, Israel must exercise caution when carrying out reprisals against Hezbollah. Israel can easily inflict punishing blows on Lebanon, which should be reining in Hezbollah. In Operation Grapes of Wrath in 1996, Israel hit Lebanon hard. But such raids may destabilize the Lebanese government, which is under the sway of Syria, and upset the United States, Israel's chief ally and benefactor.

Observers agree that Hezbollah would be virtually toothless without the patronage of Iran and Syria. Iran – whose budding nuclear program arouses immense concern in the United States and Israel – provides Hezbollah with ideological legitimacy and financial and military help. Syria gives Hezbollah logistical aid and weapons.

Israel has not used force, so far at least, to discourage Iran from helping Hezbollah. But Syria – which has dominated Lebanon since 1976 and is now coming under increasing international pressure to withdraw its 14,000 troops from Lebanon – is a different matter.

In April and July 2001, following unprovoked Hezbollah attacks on Israeli positions in Shabaa Farms, Israel bombed Syrian radar stations in Lebanon. These shots across the bow may have convinced Syria's young president, Bashar Assad, to tread cautiously when dealing with Israel.

Its pronouncements notwithstanding, Israel may not be all that eager to push Syria out of Lebanon. Last December, Gen. Giora Eiland, head of the Israeli National Security Council, submitted a memorandum to Sharon arguing that a Syrian pullout would be counter to Israel's interests. Eiland contended that Syria's departure could leave a vacuum and give Hezbollah much greater operational freedom to escalate its conflict with Israel. But Hezbollah does not pose an existential threat to Israel. If need be, the Israeli armed forces are perfectly capable of dealing with Hezbollah's brinkmanship.

BJE asks parents to fully explore tuition subsidies

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) is asking parents worried about the cost of Jewish education to consider tuition subsidies before completely abandoning a day school education for their children.

Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's Senior Vice President for Jewish Education & Identity, worries about individuals who feel they cannot afford day school fees but are too uncomfortable to ask for a subsidy.

"There are countless families we are losing through the cracks, those who never contemplate a Jewish education for their kids because of the cost. This is tragic," he explained. "We want to make it clear that parents should look into subsidies for their children before they abandon the idea completely. The schools will not deny any child the right to a Jewish education," he added.

This academic year, UJA Federation will be allocating nearly eight million dollars in tuition subsidies for 2,300 students at 13 BJE affiliated Jewish day schools which range from Orthodox to Reform to non-denominational. This is supplemented by funding from the schools themselves for tuition subsidies. At the same time, BJE is working with the schools to improve marketing techniques and to embrace fundraising initiatives.

BJE, in cooperation with Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools, is also in the midst of discussions with the Ontario government about the cost of education.

Robin Jacobson, executive director of the Toronto Heschel School understands why parents feel anxious about asking for financial assistance.

"We know it isn't easy asking for help but everything we do and all the information we receive is strictly confidential," she explained. "We use extreme discretion. Not one member of the faculty or the principal knows which children receive subsidies. We are here for our parents; we help them every step of the way."

The reasons why families remain committed to a Jewish education are as diverse as the Toronto Jewish community itself. Many believe there is a correlation between the type of education one receives as a child and living a committed Jewish life as an adult. Still others look to the day school system for something else.

"My family lives an observant lifestyle," said a member of the community who wished to remain anonymous. "Public school is inconsistent with our needs as observant Jews. I want to send my children to school where they can celebrate Jewish holidays, observe kashrut and follow Jewish tradition. It is intrinsic to who we are. Without a subsidy I could not manage."

"I have found a community at my children's school, my family away from home. I'm not sure where I would be if I didn't have this and receiving help has made it possible," explained one Israeli now living in Toronto.

This academic year, UJA Federation will be allocating nearly $8 million in tuition subsidies for 2300 students.

CHAT Israel Trip: The start of a new, educational tradition

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Forty-five Grade 10 students from Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) recently returned from a 10-day Israel trip, which is being dubbed by school offices as the beginning of a new CHAT tradition. The trip was organized by Canada Israel Experience (CIE) - an arm of UJA Federation, responsible for all Israel based youth programming.

"We are truly delighted this year that Grade 10 responded very positively to the trip," said CHAT's director of education, Paul Shaviv. The response, according to Shaviv, indicates the recognition of an Israel trip as a vital part of the students' educational experience, as well as the willingness of parents to send their children to Israel for independent travel.

This was reaffirmed by Michael Soberman, national director of CIE, who said the CHAT Israel Program was "truly a collaborative community effort between UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, CHAT and Canada Israel Experience, which all worked together to ensure that this program came to fruition."

"It was an Israel experience in line with the schools philosophy, providing a window on Israel that was educationally rich and also fun," added Shaviv. The decision to offer the trip to Grade 10 students, according to Shaviv, was deliberate. "Taking Grade 10 students means they are still in the school for two years, and this permits us, at CHAT, to build on that experience."

Lauren Sacks - one of the participants, who had been to Israel once before with her family - said this experience was far more memorable. "Probably because I was too young the first time I went," she admitted, "but what was amazing this time was sharing it with friends and being in places I've been studying for so long." Her fondest memory was touring Jerusalem's old city because, she said, it was there that so much of her educational experience came into focus.

Next year, 400 students will be entering Grade 10 at CHAT, and Shaviv anticipates equal, if not greater, reaction to an Israel trip of this nature. "We'd be delighted next year to face the challenge of having to accommodate 400 students," he said.

Paul Godfrey to be honoured as Sportsman of the Year

On April 10, Toronto's Paul Godfrey – a man synonymous with sports in Toronto for decades - will be honoured as the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre's Sportsman of the Year for 2005.

"Paul has been instrumental in Toronto's sports scene for many years. He gives tirelessly of his time and energy to many community initiatives and we want to publicly recognize his contribution", said Harold Wolkin, managing director, BMO Nesbitt Burns and co-chair of the event.

The presentation to Godfrey will take place as the new Miles Nadal JCC hosts its inaugural Sports Celebrity Benefit. Proceeds raised at the event will be used to support youth and family sports programs in downtown Toronto.

The event will feature sports celebrities from the Toronto Argonauts, Toronto Maple Leafs, Toronto Raptors, Toronto Blue Jays and some of Canada's best-known Olympians.

Guests will have a chance to mix and mingle with the celebrities, participate in interactive sports, bid on auction items, win prizes in a raffle and enjoy terrific food and refreshments. "This is not your typical sports celebrity benefit," commented Stephanie Steen, co-chair of the event. "This is an informal affair that allows us to celebrate the facility, the community and the vital activities we have to offer. We are so pleased to have such high profile celebrities supporting our initiatives."

Sportsman of the Year Paul Godfrey.

"We have been overwhelmed by the support of the professional sports teams and the corporate community," stated Wolkin. "We wish to thank our corporate donors - the Toronto Argonauts, Toronto Blue Jays, Toronto Maple Leafs, Toronto Raptors, Goodman LLP, MDC Corporation, RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust, Torquest Partners, Ogilvy Renault and Gluskin Sheff & Associates. The confidence they have shown in us is tremendous; without them this benefit would not be possible."

The Miles Nadal JCC, a UJA Federation Tomorrow Campaign project, is a 117,000 square foot facility located in the heart of the city, at the corner of Spadina Avenue and Bloor Street. Recent renovations make the facility the focal point of the area and a vital institution in downtown Toronto. The Miles Nadal JCC is dedicated to serving the community, the cultural, educational and recreational needs of Torontonians. Its programs and services are guided by Jewish values and are open to all members regardless of race, origin or religious affiliation.

Tickets are $180 each and can be purchased by calling 416-924-6211 extension 121.

Ontario's finest learning from Israel's best

By REBECCA GLUCK SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Ontario police chiefs who participated in last week's mission to Israel are back after a five day excursion which explored Israeli police procedures and security facilities.

The mission was sponsored by UJA Federation, Canadian Jewish Congress, El Al Israel Airlines and The Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police (OACP).

Ontario's Community Safety and Correctional Services Minister, Monte Kwinter, who co-chaired the five-day mission with York Region's Police Chief Armand La Barge and CJC Ontario Region chair Joel Richler, expressed praise for the Ofek Juvenile Correctional Facility in Israel's northern region.

"It was extremely interesting and impressive; a state-of-the-art facility," said Kwinter, who drew from his own experience in working with correctional facilities in Ontario. "Having what to compare to, I was truly amazed by the quality of the facility," he said.

The group interacted with inmates, as well as with correctional officers. "It was a marvelous exchange," added Kwinter.

Other highlights of the mission included visits to strategic zones such as the Golan Heights and the seam line separating Israel from Palestinian Authority territory.

The group also visited two police sites in the old city of Jerusalem and toured the city with a police volunteer who explained the community-police relationship, in addition to touring sites of Jewish and Christian historical significance.

Other participants on this mission included former Toronto police chief Julian Fantino, who is now Ontario's Commissioner of Emergency Management, as well as Dr. James Young, Federal Commissioner of Emergency Management and senior adviser on security and forensics to Canada's deputy prime minister Anne McLellan, the Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness.

Accompanying the police chiefs were CJC CEO Bernie Farber, and Morris Zbar, former Ontario Deputy Minister of Correctional Services and currently senior vice president, Operations and Corporate Relations of UJA Federation.

Toronto debuts new Anne Frank exhibit

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

More than 150 guests made their way to Toronto's First Canadian Place Gallery recently to witness the official opening of Anne Frank: A Private Photo Album, brought to Toronto – the only Canadian city to present the exhibit – by UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

This new exhibit – chaired by Rosanne Ain and Dr. Irv Gottesman - consists of 69 never-before-seen photographs taken by Otto Frank of his daughters Margot and Anne, and his wife Edith between 1927 and 1942. The photographs show a unique glimpse into the life of Dutch-born Anne Frank who was eventually murdered by the Nazis.

"It is impossible to comprehend or imagine the Holocaust unless you lived through it," said the Netherlands Ambassador to Canada, Van Hellenberg Hubar, the evening's featured speaker. "In order to get a feel for what happened, to have an approximation of the enormity, we need to have instruments to simply understand – we need something tangible. Anne Frank, her diary, the books written about her and these photos are very important for that reason," he explained.

"Behind me on the screen is the motto, 'remembering the past, embracing the future,' said David Engel, vice chair of the UJA Federation board of directors. "It seems especially fitting that through the partnership with our Holocaust Centre and the Anne Frank Centre, we are able to accomplish this by bringing these photographs to Toronto."

Other dignitaries on hand at the event were Mike Feldman, Toronto's deputy mayor and Dr. Marie Bountrogianni, Ontario's minister of Citizenship & Immigration and Children and Youth Services.

"We are so proud of the opening of the exhibit and how wonderfully it was attended," said Lorraine Sandler, chair, Holocaust Centre of Toronto. "There was also a sense of sincerity and warmth from all the dignitaries on hand. It was clear that they understood the importance of this exhibit, and it wasn't simply another photo opportunity for them."

Students from Jewish day schools, public schools, and Catholic schools across the Greater Toronto Area have been making their way to the exhibit on organized class trips.

"It's absolutely vital that these youngsters view this exhibit," said Sandler. "What we want them to learn is that Anne Frank was like them in many ways; from a middle-class family that loved her. We want children to understand that we live in a multicultural society that accepts many faiths and cultures. Atrocities like the Holocaust start when civil speech and civil behaviour and actions diminish. They must learn that it's up to each of us to make sure nothing like the Holocaust ever happens again."

Anne Frank: A Private Photo Album continues until March 18 at First Canadian Place Gallery, Adelaide Street entrance.

SkyLink, launched 25 years ago, is in the business of getting people and cargo where they need to go - on time, on budget and safely - whether leasing a helicopter in Africa for food distribution and relief programs, or chartering the world's largest aircraft (AN124) to move oversized cargo to remote sites around the world.

Unheralded community workers deserve our thanks

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

Henry Irving was a renowned actor, producer and director of the English stage toward the end of the 19th century. In casting a production, Irving regularly called upon three or four performers in his company's pool of talent. He referred to these performers as his "important" actors.

Irving looked for special characteristics in the people whom he called his important actors. He believed that good actors could do the scenes they were given to do, and do them as they were told to do. Put another way, important actors do not call attention to themselves by upstaging the star. They do what they are supposed to do in order to strengthen the structure and the message of the play.

In every organization, there are individuals who do not occupy positions of leadership. Instead, they do an excellent job in whatever task they undertake. They do the truly hard work, often unseen and unheralded, that make the committees, projects and organizations succeed.

At the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors in Montreal, for example, I have witnessed tremendous dedication by the staff. There are the receptionists who help members find the office and get the assistance they require; the security guards who ensure safety while respecting people's boundaries; and the group workers who go that extra step to enhance and enrich the experiences of the members.

Remove these people and there is no Cummings Centre; take them away and there are no senior programs. Indeed, the leaders, volunteers and donors are essential, but they do not perform the real work. It is the staff who carries out, to paraphrase Irving, the truly important actions that give an organization energy and vitality.

Irving looked for a second characteristic in his important actors. He said it is "that character which comes into play at a dangerous moment." Apparently, all plays are dangerous or have dangerous moments in them, moments that, because of a misstep, a wrong look or a foolish gesture, can destroy the entire effect of the play. An important actor is one who supports the stars and the production in such difficult and delicate moments.

In our community, there are such important actors. I have the opportunity to see them at work every week in the palliative care unit of the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal. Under difficult and demanding conditions, doctors, nurses, therapists and co-ordinators manifest exemplary sensitivity, caring and diligence during those moments at the end of life that might otherwise overwhelm and engulf patients and their families. They face extraordinary moments; moments of anger and relief, moments of fear and compassion, and moments of loss and love. In addition, they must deal with their own feelings as they participate in the unique journeys of the dying. I am privileged to work with them. I marvel at their skills; I salute their strength.

In our community, it is often the practice to honour the "stars" – those who give, those who endow, those who build and those who volunteer. Indeed, they deserve the status and the prestige. Our community is in their debt. However, for this member of the community, these are not the most important actors. For without the people who do the work that serves the needs of the community's members, there would be no community and no programs, and our buildings would have no use.

Let us bear in mind that the most precious resource we possess as a Jewish community is the people who do the basic, hands-on work. In the mind of this writer, they are our real "headliners."

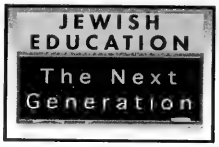
The Torah, science and intellectual debate

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Two recent events within the Orthodox community shed light both on its educational triumphs and its failures.



On March 1 came a celebration of Siyum HaShas, the monumental accomplishment of the completion of the Talmud cycle over the course of more than seven years, based on the learning of one daf (page) of Gemarah per day.

The diligence and commitment to study that this entails is reflective of an impressive religious passion and seriousness regarding Torah. Thousands of people worldwide devoted themselves to covering the breadth of the Oral Law and, in doing so, demonstrated the primacy of God's word in a culture in which materialism often obscures the significance of the spiritual. This can only be seen as a resounding success.

At the same time, a rather thoughtlessly cruel article appeared in a Toronto Jewish newspaper – essentially a reprint from a haredi publication – which tacitly endorses what can only be seen as the tragic banning of a series of books by Rabbi Natan Slifkin, a well-known author on issues relating to Torah and science.

It appears that Rav Slifkin had the temerity to suggest that earlier Torah authorities may not have always had the most accurate scientific views in certain instances, a thought that is entirely unoriginal, given that this echoes similar criticisms held by Maimonides and others. Rav Slifkin also proposes that it is a viable – but not exclusive – Torah position to assert that the world may not literally be 5765 years old. Such a position is of course a given in scientific circles, and one would be hard pressed to see in it any halachic or even theological ramifications, such as a violation of one of Maimonides 13 principles of faith.

For his "thought-crimes," Rav Slifkin has suffered a kind of Orwellian erasure: labelled a heretic; slandered and ridiculed by many who have neither read his work in its full context nor seem to exhibit the requisite sophistication regarding the pertinent issues that he raises. This is the polar opposite of the glory of what Siyum HaShas represents – the Orthodox relationship to knowledge now exposed at its most fearful, agonizingly simplistic and vindictive. A student of mine was so disgusted by the whole affair that he wondered that people wouldn't turn away from religion altogether based on the kind of horrendous behaviour exhibited by those who are quick to throw out charges of heresy without reckoning on the consequences of such rashness. I found that I had little to offer in the way of response, and in truth felt ashamed both at the suppression of Rav Slifkin's books and the chilling attempt to outlaw intellectual debate of all kinds.

Currently, the haredi world faces a fork in the road. Does it wish to lead and inspire Jews through an engagement with the complexity of God's universe with the wisdom and tenacious desire that were its traditional hallmarks? It is uniquely suited to such leadership and can be a shining model of religious integrity and sacrifice for higher ideals. Or will the disturbing trend of heresy- hunting and a remarkable constriction of what is considered "Torah true," which has increasingly dominated its discourse in recent years, ultimately hold the day? The choice is a fateful one and will resound for years to come, leading either to further alienation or the ability to communicate with power and dignity to all Jews everywhere.

'Slothdom can save humanity'

Sloth: The Seven Deadly Sins by Wendy Wasserstein, Oxford University Press.

Books
Bernard Baskin

How do you feel about work? Opinions, of course, vary. The poet Robert Frost wrote, "By working faithfully eight hours a day you may eventually get to be a boss and work 12 hours a day." The writer Thomas Carlyle was convinced that "work is the grand cure of all the maladies and miseries that ever beset mankind." Some cynic was certain that "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy and Jill a wealthy widow."

My dictionary defines sloth as a disinclination to action or labour. Why was it included among the seven deadly sins? Probably because laziness leads to indifference or lack of commitment to vital individual or communal responsibilities.

North Americans generally are not afflicted with sloth. Hectic schedules rule most lives. The Protestant work ethic still shames most of us into frenzied days of unremitting toil. Probably speaking for a majority of his fellows, Charles Mayo, of the Mayo Clinic, kept this motto on his office wall: "There is no fun like work." An old American maxim has it that the man who watches the clock seldom becomes the man of the hour.

Not surprisingly, Judaism has always frowned on sloth. The Book of Proverbs advises, "Go to the ant, you sluggard; consider her ways and be wise." The author of Ecclesiastes warns, "Through slothfulness, the rafters sink in, and through the idleness of hands the house leaks." The Talmud indicates that the Shchinah does not rest upon one in the midst of idleness. Abraham Ibn Ezra puts his concern graphically, "The sleeping cat doesn't catch the rat."

Wendy Wasserstein decided that the best approach to this rather dim subject was humour. So she preaches the virtues and benefits of sloth and parodies both the self-help genre and the apathetic mentality of Americans. She writes, "To all of these lies, I say no one ever went to war because they were sloths. No one was ever murdered or killed in the name of sloth. Furthermore, sloths don't go on religious crusades. Terrorism requires initiative and cunning. If sloths are fundamentalists, their fundamentalist belief is to rest. Hate takes energy. Destroying the ozone layer requires industry. Therefore, slothdom can save humanity."

The author takes on the persona of a male former achiever who has discovered that indolence is bliss and is now promoting the cultivation of "lethargiosis."

She works hard to be funny and it shows. "Before I found sloth, I was an angry, driven, competitive young man. Now I am content in my own blasé oblivion. I have found my way to cluttered unconsciousness and you can too… Sloth looks at all the rules and says, 'No, thank you.' And that, ladies and gentlemen, is the greatest gift you can give yourself."

Some readers will find the text witty and humorous. Others will react with solemn detachment and find little that is risible. This much remains clear – the worst part of not working is that you can't stop to rest. Wasserstein concludes her screed with the heartening benediction, "Sleep well, fellow sloths."

Building Israel and being built by it

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When Israel was young, Jewish volunteers would come from around the world to help work its land, build its cities and drain its swamps. Nowadays Israel doesn't need any more swamps drained, but if you are looking for a different kind of adventure, new challenges are waiting. There are several intriguing programs designed for volunteers from abroad that will let you work among Israelis.

Israel's Magen David Adom runs an ambulance program for volunteers 18 to 25. After a week-long first-aid training course in English, participants spend two months giving first aid and emergency care. Volunteers must be conversant in Hebrew. [www.magendavidadom.org/jafi.asp]

In his online diary, MDA volunteer Anthony Herman says emergency calls have included car accidents, heart attacks, fevers, building collapses, shootings, bombings and a soccer riot. But his most memorable call was his last one. "Just before my shift ended, dispatch informed us that a mother was giving birth in her apartment. We arrived just in time to help with the delivery. It is something I shall never forget – for my final call I was able to participate in the miracle of birth. The last sound of my MDA service was not the wailing of the sirens, but the cries of a newborn baby." [http://tinyurl.com/7xfrs]

Lehavot Firefighters for Israel is a new program that trains volunteers aged 18 to 35 and places them in fire stations across the country. Instruction is in English. [www.destinationisrael.com/lehavot.asp]

Here's how another volunteer site sells itself: "Why would anyone on vacation rise at 6 a.m., work eight hours a day, five days a week, endure Spartan accommodations and army food – and pay to do it? Join [Sar-El] Volunteers for Israel and you'll understand." [www.sar-el.org/]

Volunteers in good health from their late teens to their 70s can work in hospitals and doing non-military work on army bases. John Nettleton of Springfield, Oregon, describes his service this way. "During a 26-year career as a fighter pilot, I was generously provided the constant support of hundreds of people in logistics and maintenance. Now, for a few weeks at least, I could do some payback and, as a humble warehouseman, provide support for frontline fighters." [www.vfi-usa.org/] Here's the address of their Canadian site: [www.serve.com/CVI/]

Graduates or young professionals can take a look at Stagerim, the Professional Internship Program. In the past, interns have been placed in a wide range of fields, including medicine, tourism, high-tech, law, education, social service and communications. [www.israelprograms.org/Stagerim.htm] Dental Volunteers for Israel offers licensed dentists the opportunity to volunteer to work in a Jerusalem clinic treating underprivileged children. [www.dental-dvi.co.il/]

Otzma describes itself as "the ultimate real life experience." Otzma is interesting because it has you working in three different settings over the course of the 10-month program. You start off by learning Hebrew while working in an absorption centre, followed by community service such as working with the elderly or in a centre for children from problem families. You complete Otzma working in a social agency or Jewish communal service organization. [www.otzma.org]

Nesiya is a six-week program that includes community service in Jerusalem, the Galil and at the Bedouin development town outside of Be'er Sheva. [www.nesiya.org/] Also, check out "Livnot U'Lehibanot – To Build [Israel] and Be Built [by it]," which offers a community service component in addition to its educational programs. [www.thelivnotexperience.com/] For more opportunities in Israel, visit the Project 1000 Volunteers page. [www.israelprograms.org/volunteer.htm]

The WUJS Institute was founded by the World Union of Jewish Students in 1968. Unlike many other programs that are based in major population centres, students spend seven months in the Negev town of Arad studying Hebrew as well as Israeli and Jewish courses. After the initial session, most students spend another five months working or volunteering in their fields of expertise elsewhere in the country. [www.wujs-arad.org/]

I didn't drain any swamps, but I have always treasured my WUJS experience.

Soviet Jews have revitalized Jewish community in Germany

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The mass influx of Soviet Jews into Germany since the early 1990s has revitalized a community that was in sharp decline, but their integration has been problematic, a conference at the University of Toronto was told last week.

The conference, The New German Jewry and the European Context, was attended by experts from several countries, including Germany and Israel.

The organizer, Y. Michal Bodemann, a University of Toronto sociology professor, is the author of A Jewish Family in Germany Today: An Intimate Portrait, published recently by Duke University Press.

At least 200,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union have immigrated to Germany since reunification in 1990 and the end of the Cold War about a year later, said Julius Schoeps, the director of the Moses Mendelssohn Centre For European Jewish Studies in Potsdam.

Claiming Russian Jews have "saved Jewish life in Germany," he said the community was in its "death throes" prior to these historic developments and consisted of just 30,000 Jews.

Due to these events, Germany currently has the third largest Jewish community in western Europe after France and Britain, noted historian Michael Brenner, the chair of Jewish studies at Ludwig Maximilians University in Munich.

Germany's Jewish population would have dropped to 20,000 had it not been for this wave of immigration, he said.

In the past two years, more Russian Jews have settled in Germany than either Israel or the United States, Schoeps disclosed.

Such has been the impact of Soviet immigration that several Jewish communities in Germany, notably Halle and Schwerin, consist virtually entirely of Russian Jews, said Judith Kessler, the editor of the periodical Jewish Berlin.

And although they have culturally enriched the community and will probably form its leadership in the future, upward of 75 per cent of Russian Jews are unemployed and rely on welfare payments, Kessler observed.

Bodemann said a high proportion of the new immigrants are geriatric, with a medium age of 54, and tend to be pensioners. Kessler said only about 15 per cent of Russian Jews are under the age of 20.

Given Germany's current high unemployment rate, many younger Russian Jews are moving to the United States in search of better job opportunities.

Brenner said Britain rather than Israel has become the destination of choice for young Jews wishing to leave Germany.

If these trends continue, Bodemann observed, the Jewish community may shrink to about 65,000 within 25 years.

Schoeps said 80 per cent of Jews in Germany today are of Russian and eastern European origin. In Brenner's estimation, the community is made up of "little islands of different groups," ranging from Russians and Israelis in Berlin to Iranians and Romanians in Hamburg. "It's anything but a homogeneous community."

But the leadership of its chief body – the Central Council of Jews in Germany – has always remained in the hands of German-born Jews, Brenner said.

Citing figures he amassed in 1999, Schoeps said about 50 per cent of Russian Jews feel they have yet to be properly integrated in German society.

In general, Russian Jews are better integrated in Israel and the United States than in Germany.

Some 80,000 out of about 200,000 have registered with the Jewish community, but only a fraction are really active in it, he went on to say.

> Germany currently has the third largest Jewish community in western Europe

In somewhat wry fashion, Kessler described the average Russian Jew as a civil engineer who wants a flat and a job from the Jewish community.

Many Russian Jews are in mixed marriages and regard themselves Jewish in ethnic rather than religious terms.

Seventy per cent hold academic degrees, but approximately 40 per cent are out of work, Schoeps said. As a result, some Russian Jews suffer from psychosomatic and family problems.

They are largely cut off from Judaism and Jewish culture, and their affiliation with the community is at best marginal, Kessler said.

Sixty per cent are atheists, but two-thirds hope their children will marry Jews.

The majority join Jewish organizations not for religious but for economic reasons.

Nearly half of all Russian Jews are from Ukraine and other former Soviet republics.

Most immigrated to Germany to improve their economic status and join friends and relatives already there.

Anti-Semitism was not a significant factor in their decision to leave their former homelands, she stated.

Bodemann suggested Germany generally attracts a class of more assimilated Russian Jews.

Jews of mixed ancestry who endured anti-Semitism in the old country find themselves in an ironic situation and a twilight zone in Germany, he said.

A.V. Israel has helped deaf children for 10 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jozie and Nathan Eisner

For 10 years, Jozie and Nathan Eisner have been blanketing Israel's deaf community in sound.

They are co-founders of A.V. Israel, a non-profit organization of professionals and parents of hearing impaired children, who are committed to the auditory-verbal approach of teaching deaf children.

The Eisners are the parents of a hearing son, 30, a son, 25, who is severely deaf, and a daughter, 28, who is profoundly deaf – she is also the mother of four-year-old triplets and a baby.

The couple was recently in Toronto to raise awareness of A.V. Israel, which they founded after they made aliyah with their children.

The Eisners discovered the auditory-verbal approach when their daughter was three, and they became involved with Voice Through Hearing Impaired Children. Through this organization, they met Warren Estabrooks, a certified auditory verbal therapist.

The therapy, which involves constantly surrounding the child with sound, emphasizes early diagnosis, advanced audiological rehabilitation and inclusion of the child in the hearing world.

The couple had planned to make aliyah years earlier, said Jozie, but their plans were put on hold when they received their daughter's diagnosis.

"We were overwhelmed with the situation, and we had heard about Warren Estabrooks. We knew that if our child had any chance of being mainstreamed, it would be with him. We didn't know what services were available in Israel."

In 1990, however, when their daughter was in high school – she went on to study in college – they decided to make the move.

"We visited schools and hospitals in Israel and discovered that their deaf children were not achieving as much as the children here.

"They were learning [mainly through lip reading and sign language] and because a lot of sounds look alike, they didn't learn to speak well," said Nathan.

When children are taught through the auditory-verbal approach, their auditory sensory nerves become stimulated, and they learn to process the sounds, he said.

"It's a simple system, but it is a lot of work; parents must commit. They have to bathe the child in rich sound. It is a family oriented method, and the child must have constant adult interaction."

When the Eisners met Eli and Elaine Matlow, a couple with profoundly deaf twins, they decided to form A.V. Israel so that similar work could be done in that country. "Children there need the same chance as children everywhere else."

In the past 10 years, they have opened two auditory-verbal centres, which provide therapy, house a library of materials, serve as a training centre for new professionals, provide consultation and assessment services, and offer support to families.

As well, they've had a book written for parents, produced videos for parents and teachers, and they are working on a handbook about mainstreaming hearing impaired children.

They also put out a newsletter and serve as a lobby for rights of the deaf and for recognition by official authorities of the auditory-verbal approach.

"We want every parent to have the pleasure of seeing their kids fully integrated into regular society. The sky is the limit."

When parents first discover their child is deaf, they feel devastated, said Jozie. "We think they'll [never] be able to communicate. If they're trained properly, however, it doesn't have to be that way.

"Parents need to be strong. [It doesn't help] to have people feel sorry for you. It's important to be with families that have gone through the same thing."

The Eisners personal news is that their daughter recently underwent a cochlear implant.

"To me, this is a miracle. After months of hard work in auditory-verbal therapy during which she has had to learn to process the sounds she receives, she is now able to hear running water, cars passing by, her kids calling and even her husband chewing his food.

"I believe in taking advantage of whatever technology is available. Why take a horse and buggy if you can fly?"

Jozie's dream, she said, "is for every mother with a deaf child to feel what we feel today."

For information, e-mail Eisner at info@avisrael.org.il or write P.O.B. 391, Ra'anana, Israel 43103.

15-year-old organizes Shabbaton for junior high students

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Grade 10 student Rachel Lichtman is only 15, but already she is a woman with a mission.

That mission is to show young people that it's fun to be Jewish.

Her uncle, Rabbi Danny Bahar, used to run the Jewish Youth Learning Centre, and she would go to programs he organized, and had a wonderful time. "On one trip, I learned how to fish, and I actually caught one," she said. "Mind you," she added, "I never ate fish again…"

Remembering how much she enjoyed the Shabbatons Rabbi Bahar arranged, she decided it was time to organize one, too. "Being a really young person myself, I know what they would enjoy. Besides, I am less intimidating."

Rachel, who attends the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Richmond Hill branch, decided to begin with a Shabbaton for junior high students, those in grades 7 and 8. It will be held at Eagle Wood Resort, on Lake Simcoe near Jackson's Point, from April 1 to 3. Transportation will be provided.

Rabbi Bahar pointed out that Rachel has planned everything herself. There will be adults, including himself and his wife, there to supervise and to ensure safety, but Rachel and several of her friends are in charge. "She even planned the menu," he said. Not to mention cooking the food. (He is the kashrut supervisor for the weekend.)

There will be lots of activities, Rachel said. Besides davening and meals with singing and other things to give a real Shabbat experience, there will be sports; a bonfire with marshmallows and hot dogs; a singsong; a showing of videos, including popcorn; and ping-pong. There are walking paths that all lead back to Eagle Wood "just in case you have a poor sense of direction," she added.

While she hopes that everyone will join in the activities, no one has to. "We are not judgmental. We want to show that being Jewish is fun, and kids can be themselves and feel comfortable." There will be lots of free time.

Cost of the weekend is $75, which includes transportation and everything else.

She is calling her new effort Jewish Futures, saying "that is really what this is all about!"

Rachel will not be resting on her laurels after this weekend. She has dreams – another Shabbaton for high school students in Niagara Falls, maybe day trips. "We will see what happens."

For more information, or to register, call Rabbi Danny Bahar, 905-882-6755, or e-mail Jfutures@rogers.com.

Chabad increasing influence in Germany

Unless they convert to Judaism, they may be excluded from membership in the Jewish community, which generally defines Judaism within an Orthodox framework.

"This is humiliating for them and causes alienation."

Brenner said eastern European Jews settled on "blood-soaked" German soil after World War II despite Germany's central role in the Holocaust. Indeed, German Jews went back to their former homes within weeks of Nazi Germany's defeat. And in Cologne, Jews re-established their community even prior to Germany's surrender on May 8, 1945.

Yet, after the Spanish Inquisition, hundreds of years elapsed before Jews started returning to Spain, according to Brenner.

He said German converts to Judaism play an increasingly important role in Jewish life, but scholars have not paid sufficient attention to this phenomenon.

In the meantime, Chabad Lubavitch is increasing its influence in Germany to the point where it may one day dominate religious life in the community.

Among the other participants at the conference were Hanno Loewy of the University of Constance, Leslie Morris of the University of Minnesota, Frank Stern of the University of Vienna, Dan Diner of the Hebrew University, Liliane Weissberg of the University of Pennsylvania, and Anna Shternshis of the University of Toronto.

Small batch treats provide a new spin on Purim

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

I am an unabashed and, most of the time, guilt free, lover of desserts. I confess, I adore making and eating desserts. So Purim, with its focus on sweets and emphasis on sharing them with loved ones through mishloach manot, speaks to my heart's passion.

Step into my house and it's perfumed (OK, I'll be honest, this could be any Wednesday during the week of any month but especially so during Purim) with the sweet tones of butter, flour, spices and fruit.

My love of baking leaves me with a not so obvious problem however. Although I love to try, make and eat sweets, I want to try, make and enjoy different desserts rather often. So recipes that yield several dozen cookies or hamantaschen or a large pan of brownies often don't suit either my own penchant for variety or the needs of my three-member family.

Imagine my delight upon discovering a new book called Small Batch Baking, by Debby Maugans Nakos (Workman Publishing). A girl after my own heart, Maugans Nakos found herself in the same dilemma as I did. A lover of baking, mother of two girls, she was too often stopped by the daunting yield of most baking recipes or faced with the tempting leftovers the morning after a special occasion. Thankfully, she decided to do something about it and her little gem of a cookbook was born.

With recipes for virtually every favourite sweet, Maugans Nakos made sure her yields are small, either six to eight cookies, two small cakes, three scones or just the most satisfying three brownies.

She conveniently uses conventional equipment most of us are sure to have on hand, such as muffin tins, baking sheets and washed out 14-oz. cans, for small cakes. To guarantee that her yields remain manageable, the quantities in the recipes are necessarily somewhat unconventional – she often uses just two tbsp. of a beaten egg, instead of a whole one (I use the rest to make French toast or scrambled eggs the next morning). Although there are no photographs, the recipes are easy to follow and just plain scrumptious. She includes plenty of tips for garnishings, variations on most of her cake and cookie recipes and even matching information on fruits and desserts.

For accomplished bakers, there may be a bit too much detail and explanation, but this is easy to scan when you're reading the recipes and trying your best to decide what to make next. So whether you're a small family yearning for a sweet bite after dinner, a mom sending a treat for your Queen Esther or Mordechai on the special day, or craving a certain variety in your mishloach manot this year, try the following recipes for surefire, rich flavoured winners.

CHOCOLATE TOFFEE COOKIES

4 oz. bittersweet or semisweet chocolate, chopped (about 3/4 cup)
2 tsp. unsalted butter
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour
3/4 tsp. baking powder
pinch salt
1/4 cup + 3 tbsp. granulated sugar
1 large egg
1/2 tsp. vanilla
1 1/2 Skor bars, coarsely chopped

Combine the chocolate and butter in a small microwave-safe bowl and microwave on high power for 1 minute, then stir until the mixture is smooth. Let the chocolate mixture cook to lukewarm.

Place the flour, baking powder and salt in a small bowl and whisk to blend well.

Place the sugar and egg in a medium-sized mixing bowl and beat with a hand held mixer on high speed until the mixture is thick and pale, 2 to 3 minutes. Beat in the chocolate mixture and the vanilla on high speed. Then reduce the mixer speed to low and beat in the flour mixture until blended, 20 to 30 seconds. Stir in the candy pieces with a wooden spoon. Cover the bowl and refrigerate until it is firm, 20 to 30 minutes.

Place a rack in the centre of the oven and preheat oven to 350. Line a baking sheet with parchment.

Scoop 1/4-cup quantities of the batter onto the parchment, spacing the cookies 3 inches apart. Using a spatula, press the cookies down to flatten them to 3/4-in. thickness. Bake the cookies just until the tops are dry and cracked but the cookies are still soft to the touch, 21 to 23 minutes.

Remove the baking sheets from the oven and slide the parchment onto a wire rack. Let the cookies cool completely on the parchment. Then use a metal spatula to lift them off the paper. Makes 6 large cookies.

WHOLE WHEAT BANANA BREAD

¼ cup + 1 tbsp. all-purpose flour
¼ cup whole wheat flour
½ tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. baking soda
⅛ tsp. salt
½ cup mashed ripe bananas
¼ cup + 2 tbsp. packed light brown sugar
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
¾ tsp. vanilla
1 yolk of medium egg
¼ cup chopped walnuts or pecans(optional)

Place a rack in the centre of the oven and preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease 1 petite loaf pan (2-cup capacity, about 5x3 in.); set it aside.

Place both flours, baking powder, baking soda and salt in a medium-sized mixing bowl and whisk to blend.

Place the mashed banana, brown sugar, oil, vanilla and egg yolk in a small bowl and whisk to blend. Add the banana mixture to the flour mixture all at once, and stir just until blended. Stir in the walnuts, if using.

Pour the batter into the prepared loaf pan, and bake until a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean, 23 to 25 minutes.

Remove pan from oven and let it cool on a wire rack for 10 minutes. Invert the pan over the rack, releasing the bread, and let the bread cool, upright, on the rack. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 1 small loaf.

CHOCOLATE GLAZED RASPBERRY CHEESECAKES

Raspberry Reduction:
2 cups frozen unsweetened raspberries, thawed but not drained
Crust:
½ cup crushed chocolate wafers
1 tsp. granulated sugar
2 tbsp. unsalted butter, melted
Filling:
1 pkg. (8 oz.) cream cheese, room temperature
¼ cup granulated sugar
1 egg
1 egg yolk
1 tbsp. whipping cream
½ tsp. vanilla
Rich Chocolate Ganache:
¼ cup + 2 tbsp. whipping cream
5 oz. high quality bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped

For the raspberry reduction: Place a fine-mesh sieve over a small saucepan, and press the raspberries and juices through it. Stir in the sugar. Bring the mixture to a boil over medium-high heat, stirring constantly, until the sugar dissolves. Boil, stirring occasionally, until the mixture is reduced to 3 tablespoons, 18 to 20 minutes. Remove pan from heat and let cool completely.

Place a rack in the centre of the oven and preheat the oven to 325. Lightly grease the insides of three 8-oz. cans. Line the bottoms with rounds of parchment paper. Cut out three 11x2-inch strips of parchment and line the inside of each can with a strip; the strip should reach to the top of the can. Place the cans on a baking sheet for easier handling; set aside.

Crust: Place the crushed cookies and 1 tsp. sugar in a small bowl and stir to mix. Add the melted butter and toss with a fork until the crumbs are evenly moistened. Spoon the crumb mixture into the prepared cans, dividing evenly. Gently press down the crumb mixture with your fingertips. Bake for 10 minutes. Transfer to a wire rack to cool.

Filling: Beat cream cheese and sugar with a hand held mixer until mixture is smooth and creamy, 45 seconds. On low speed, add egg and egg yolk, mixing just until they are blended, 15 to 20 seconds. Then beat in the raspberry reduction, and vanilla just until blended, 15 to 20 seconds. Spoon the batter over the crusts, dividing evenly. Bake on baking sheets until they are just set, about 27 minutes.

Transfer the cheesecakes to a wire rack to cool completely in the cans. Then cover and refrigerate for 6 hours or overnight.

Ganache: Bring cream to a boil over medium-high heat. Immediately pour it over the chocolate in a bowl, whisking until chocolate is completely melted and smooth.

To serve, run a small sharp knife around the inside of the can to loosen the cheesecakes. Gently turn the cakes out, remove the parchment and place them upright on the wire rack. Spoon the ganache over the cheesecakes, using a spatula to smooth it over the top and side. Arrange fresh raspberries on the tops and refrigerate until ganache is just firm, about 20 minutes. Makes 3 cheesecakes.

Isaac Shamai ז"ל — died peacefully in his sleep on March 1 2005, in Southfield Michigan. He looked forward to his 83rd birthday in May, and the visits of his children and grandchildren, but he left too soon. Complications of diabetes left him a double amputee in 1998, but he never lost his ability to share a laugh, and never complained about the battles he faced with his declining health. His great heart finally failed him, but he never lost his wit.

He will be remembered with great fondness by his friends and business associates in Detroit, and by family in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa and Vancouver. He is survived by his daughters, Rebecca, Ruth, Sally and Lisa, their husbands and partners, and his grandchildren, Zoey (and Trevor), Marc, Sam, Ariel, Zachary, and Ethan.

At his request, he was cremated in Detroit, and shiva was observed in Toronto. A memorial service is planned in Detroit, time and place to be announced. Donations in his memory may be directed to the Jewish Family and Child Service of Toronto.

Obituary

Survivor wrote about her wartime experiences

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Ibolya Grossman, a local Holocaust educator and speaker who wrote about her wartime experiences and love of Canada in a popular book, died in Toronto Feb. 26. She was "a very young 88," said her son, Andy Réti.

A survivor of Budapest's Jewish ghetto under the Nazi occupation, Grossman fled Hungary with her teenaged son during the 1956 revolution, mainly because of anti-Semitism. Both her parents were murdered at Auschwitz and her husband was shot dead while in a forced labour battalion.

Ibolya Grossman

Over the course of 15 years, she spoke to thousands of students at Toronto's Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre and was registered with the Dominion Institute's Speakers' Bureau.

She also volunteered for a variety of causes, including the Wagman Centre, Hadassah and the Hospital for Sick Children.

Grossman was a prolific writer, and in 1990, the Multicultural History Society of Ontario published her book, An Ordinary Woman in Extraordinary Times, which is partly a memoir and partly a lesson about the consequences of hatred. The book also lauded Canada as a safe haven.

She was born in the southern Hungarian town of Pecs into a poor family. Upon her arrival in Canada in January 1957, immigration authorities settled the young widow and her son in Winnipeg. Despite living in a small basement apartment, and her meagre income from piecework as a seamstress, "she loved her freedom," her son said. "From the day we got here, she had no problem."

In 1958, Grossman and her son moved to Toronto, where she found work as a cleaner at Toronto Western Hospital. She began studying English at night and once proficient, she applied for a job at the Bank of Montreal.

She was turned down, and made a fuss. "She said, 'You are rejecting me because I am Jewish,'" her son recalled. "Then they hired her."

Grossman stayed with the bank for more than 20 years as a clerk and took early retirement in 1978. She then took a course on how to retire, and was advised to do things she'd always wanted to do but never did.

So she signed up for another class, this one in creative writing, and she began chronicling her experiences in Hungary and Canada.

"She kept it a secret," said Réti. "One day, she asked me to take pictures at a book launch. I said, 'Whose?' She said, 'Mine.'"

Her book was used as a text in creative writing classes at York University for eight years. At the conclusion of each course, she would be introduced to the students, invariably to a standing ovation.

The book went through three printings and sold more than 3,000 copies.

She wrote many articles for The CJN and for Menorah, the Hungarian Jewish newspaper.

Grossman was also featured in a book of photographs of Toronto Holocaust survivors, The Ghosts That Haunt Us, by Jason Schwartz. Despite having been generally happy and upbeat, her handwritten entry beneath her portrait hinted at another side:

"I was very bitter for many long years, but you can't live with hatred in you all the time. But to forgive? I can't. And I can't forget it either. The hurt deep in my heart will stay until I die."

Apart from her son, Grossman is survived by three sisters and two grandchildren.

Reading week 2005 – volunteering in Honduras

By ALINA OLSHENITSKY
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

We load our backpacks onto a pickup truck and tie them on with rope. We leave the airport from Tegucigalpa, the capital of Honduras, and drive into the mountains of the western region of Comayagua, until we reach a village called San Rafael, a tiny, hidden place with no more than 100 residents.

This is where my personal discovery begins.

We are a group of 13 students from York University and the University of Toronto who applied to participate in a week-long trip to Honduras arranged by the American Jewish World Service (AJWS), a non-profit organization that works on poverty, hunger and health-related projects around the world. This time, AJWS partnered with Proyecto Aldea Global (PAG), a local Christian NGO based in Honduras, to send us to the village of San Rafael. We were to help create a foundation for grassroots sustainable development, by rebuilding a school.

As I arrived in San Rafael, I kept asking myself the same question over and over again: Why did I choose to come here with a Jewish group rather than with a non-religiously affiliated organization?

Every day, we woke up at 6 a.m to the sounds of roosters, donkeys and fresh mountain winds, and began our work on the school. Together with the local workers, we mixed piles of sand and cement, filled in the cracks in the floor and painted the walls.

The kindness with which the local residents had welcomed us to their village and the mutual co-operation that developed between us had made me feel such a powerful human connection to the natives of the village, that the question of why I chose to come here as a Jew and not simply as a human being kept creeping into my mind.

Why were we here as "Jewish students" and not simply as "students who care?"

Slowly, things started to clear up for me.

During one of the community meetings, Hector Immanuel, the head of San Rafael, talked to us about the hard living conditions his people have faced.

"Ever since the 1800s, life in the village has been an everyday struggle," he said. "In the past, it took us 15 days to get to the city by wagon, and now, if one of our residents gets sick, it is extremely hard to get him to a hospital. The government," he continued, "has tried to build some projects but always failed. They make promises all the time, but they all add up to lies."

I slowly found a connection between "us" and "them." I thought about our own history as Jews and the continuous struggles we have faced throughout our history: suffering, oppression, neglect. It kind of started to feel as if we were in the same boat.

But it was one of the women of the village, Donia Erundina, who finally made me realize something that hadn't hit me before.

Donia Erundina is 63 years old. She had 14 children – 10 are alive and four buried in the ground. Every morning, she wakes up at 3 a.m. to prepare breakfast and lunch for her husband and sons who go off to work in the sugar and corn fields. But despite 63 years of hard work, she is still smiling. And her eyes light up as she smiles.

Volunteers from Toronto, with a Honduran NGO leader, holding broom, spent reading week helping to build a school in San Rafael.

As I looked at her, I saw God. The light in her eyes assured me, unconditionally, that she, just like the rest of us, was born in the image of God, b'tzelem HaShem."

After I looked at Donia Erundina, the answer to why I was here as a Jew became clear. Her smile convinced me that God's light is present in every one of us and that it is our role as Jews to help make sure that it never dies off. It is this powerful sense of duty that made me feel proud of going to San Rafael not only as a human being, but specifically as a Jew.

Landry regrets Assembly's condemnation of Michaud

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Parti Québécois (PQ) leader Bernard Landry says Yves Michaud did not deserve to be denounced by the National Assembly for comments he made about Jews more than four years ago.

In a recent letter to French-language newspapers, Landry says the unanimous Dec. 14, 2000, motion was based only on Michaud's "presumed intolerance," and the veteran party activist "was not treated the way he should have been."

Landry praises Michaud's contributions to Quebec and even suggests that he should have the honour of being named a Chevalier of the Ordre national du Québec.

"It is clear that Yves Michaud's remarks... did not violate any law, and he has never elsewhere been condemned or even been prosecuted, but his fame and his exemplary public service record are considerably impacted by the National Assembly motion," Landry writes.

He says Michaud, 75, is "outspoken, but nothing in his life associates him with contemptible doctrine – rather on the contrary."

Bestowing the Ordre national du Québec on Michaud would be a good way of "putting an end to this regrettable affair with honour and dignity," he writes.

What became known as "l'affaire Michaud" was one of the reasons Premier Lucien Bouchard cited for his resignation in January, 2001.

The episode was touched off after a Dec. 5, 2000 radio interview, in which Michaud, while recalling a conversation he had had with then senator Leo Kolber, said that Jews feel they are the only people in history to have suffered. Michaud was at the time seeking the PQ nomination in a Montreal riding. The Jewish community publicly objected to the remark.

The following week, Michaud exacerbated the matter when he deplored the fact that there had not been a single "yes" vote in predominantly Jewish Cote St. Luc in the 1995 sovereignty referendum, during an estates-general on language.

He also later accused B'nai Brith Canada, which was the first organization to take Michaud to task for the radio comments, of being "extremist" and "anti-Quebec."

After the National Assembly condemnation, a rancorous public debate ensued in Quebec between detractors and supporters of Michaud. Others, although repulsed by what he said about Jews, felt that the National Assembly had overstepped its boundaries because Michaud, at the time, did not hold any public office.

Some prominent PQ members felt Michaud had been unfairly treated and a split emerged within the party ranks, which less than a month later, led to Bouchard's emotional departure.

In last month's letter, Landry calls Michaud "one of the great diplomats of Quebec," who was in the past a journalist, a Liberal and then independent MNA, and "counsellor and friend" to both Liberal leader Robert Bourassa and PQ leader René Lévesque alike.

Landry also urges the early adoption of a proposed parliamentary reform that he says will make it impossible for the National Assembly to censure an individual in the same manner as it did in Michaud's case.

Landry says no one's comments should be condemned by the National Assembly with the haste and on the "vaguely formulated" grounds that were used with Michaud, or without hearing from the accused first.

The motion denouncing Michaud, proposed by Liberal Lawrence Bergman and Péquiste André Boulerice, was presented without advance notice and passed without debate, according to Landry, who was deputy premier at the time.

If the proposed reform had been in place then, Landry says the motion would have been inadmissible, and he suggests this vindicates Michaud.

Landry's letter appears to go some way to satisfy Michaud's campaign of the past four years to have his reputation restored.

In a letter to Le Devoir after Landry's was published, prominent sovereignists Hélène Pelletier-Baillargeon, Jean-Marc Léger and Fernand Daoust congratulated Landry for his defence of Michaud, as a "first step" in recognizing the "injustice" he suffered.

This past December, Michaud went to Superior Court to force the National Assembly to retract the motion, arguing that the legislature exceeded its jurisdiction in condemning a "simple citizen."

His lawyer André Bois claimed that the National Assembly violated Michaud's freedom of speech and that it does not have the power to condemn any citizen, especially without giving them a hearing or holding a debate on the matter.

Michaud insisted in court that he is not anti-Semitic and was stating facts. He also said he has felt stigmatized ever since, especially by his Jewish neighbours in the Snowdon district, where he has lived for 40 years.

The court decided against him, and Michaud is now appealing.

Michaud has tried unsuccessfully on several occasions in the past to get the National Assembly to strike down the motion.

Both Bergman, now revenue minister, and Boulerice, who is still MNA for Ste. Marie-St. Jacques, declined to comment on Landry's letter.

Dear Judy:

There are no words to describe the love, caring and nurturing at L'chaim ... Since she has been at L'chaim, my mother has changed tremendously. She gets so much love and affection from all that she radiates happiness.

Her life before L'chaim was dull and boring. Now, most often when I call her she "has no time" to talk to me. She wouldn't come back to live with me if I paid her!

Canada's only French-language Jewish website covers anti-Semitism, Islamism

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canada's only French-language website devoted to Jewish issues such as the Middle East and anti-Semitism – as well as rising levels of local Islamist activity – was born seven months ago out a sense of frustration, its founder says.

"I was always an avid newspaper reader, and I began to spend more and more time looking at Islamist activities, and then seeing and hearing stuff nobody else seemed to know about," said David Ouellette, 36, the creator of Judeoscope.ca.

"It was frustrating. The information is out there, but it takes research," said Ouellette, who doesn't work for a mainstream news outlet and whose employer prefers not be identified in any way with the controversial site.

"We're the first and only website dealing with such issues, with exclusive stories about what's going in Islamic and Islamist organizations."

Ouellette, for example, attended a pre-Canadian election forum organized by an Islamic organization at a Montreal university, where he heard participants being warned about candidates who were Jewish and/or pro-Israel, and then told to vote accordingly.

"This, at a university!" Ouellette said.

One of Ouellette's concerns is that Islamist organizations – which he alleges are sometimes used as fronts for terrorist organizations like Hamas – are seeking to "force Islamic rule upon Muslims in Canada."

While Jewish Web surfers like Judeoscope, Ouellette said, he and his site have gained some notoriety among militant Quebec nationalists who take umbrage at his efforts to expose what he sees as negative references to Jews and Israel on staunchly nationalist websites.

One of the more fulfilling aspects of running Judeoscope, Ouellette said, is that the site shows all Quebecers that Jewish francophones in Quebec and elsewhere are prepared to assert their allegiance to Israel, as well as to declare their readiness to respond to anti-Semitism and confront the Islamist threat.

Ouellette had one other goal in mind in launching his site: to establish another voice besides those in the Jewish community establishment.

"I want to provoke reaction," he said. "We can't leave it only to the organized Jewish community to take part in the public debate concerning Jews… We need to diversify the voices."

Born in Jerusalem to a Jewish mother and a Franco-Québécois father, he studied literature at university and only started to practise journalism a couple of years ago. He filed his first stories for Proche-Orient.info, a Paris-based website that covers the Jewish world.

While Ouellette has found it nearly impossible to get his stories on Islamist activities published in local French-language publications, foreign-based media, including the Jerusalem Post and FrontPage Magazine, have carried them.

His target readership is "Jews at large," he said, but also non-Jews. Based on the site's feedback, Ouellette estimates that half of Judeoscope's readership comes from Jews in France. He said the site records about 5,000 hits a day.

Ouellette said he is seeking to generate more interest in Judeoscope – which he launched last August – by making the site more bilingual. Currently, it carries only the occasional English-language article.

His father, Prof. Jean Ouellette of the Université de Montréal, a well-known and ardent defender of Israel, is a fan.

"He likes it," Ouellette said. "He does my PR for me."

Judeoscope takes up a significant amount of Ouellette's time. With a full-time job and a family, he often has to work on his articles and the site after everyone else is asleep.

תביאו לי גננת

יורם טהר לב, מבחירי חפומונאים בישראל כתב ספר חדש, "אין כבר דרך חוזרת", שבו הוא מהרהר בקול רם על הכיוון שארצנו הקטנה הולכת אליו. טהר לב, כמו רבים אחרים, מרגיש שהוא חולק לאיגוד בתוך ארצו שלו. חשיר חבא מעביר את התחושת הזאת מאוד ברור:

"תביאו לי גננת, גננת ישנה,
שתעמיד את כל הארץ בפינה,
גננת שנותנת מכות על החשבן,
לכל התנטרישים של הגן.

נמאס לי גם לשמוע מה חולך בשיינקין
ואין לי סבלנות לכל המופלאים,
לשמוע פילוסופים בני עשרים ושתים
שילמדו אותי ואותך על החיים.

כל דוגמנית היום היא פרשנית פוליטית
תעומק המחשוף הוא עומק מחשבה,
ומי שלא נמצא לרגע בתקשורת,
בשביל הרייטינג הוא מוכן לחזור גם בתשובה.

חצי עם ישראל היום סוגד לכסף,
חצי עם ישראל סומך על הניסים,
ובגלל זה, רעי, אם נסתכל סביבנו,
מה שחולך חוק זה דווקא פספוסים.

ואל תיקחו אותי לאכטה במרינה
ואל תכירו לי עוד מצליחן חמוד,
ואל תציעו לי מסע תלאות בג'יפים,
עם כמה טבורישים וטבח צמוד.

תביאו לי גננת, גננת ישנה,
שתעמיד את כל הארץ בפינה,
גננת שנותנת מכות על החשבן,
לכל התנטרישים של הגן."

באותו עניין קראתי את הדברים הבאים:
"איך זה שכל פעם כשמראיינים מלכת יופי או נסיכת חן-חיא אומרת שמְלדות החלום שלה היה בעצם לחיות רופאה או מדענית, ותחשבו איזה הפסד לאומה זה שחן הופכות למלכות יופי...כל כך חרבה כישרון יורד לטמיון".

סוריה

סוף סוף מתחיל העולם המערבי לחבין את תפקידה של סוריה בטרור הבינלאומי. לא לחאמין שאסאד חצעיר, רופא בהשכלתו, אינו מסוגל לחבין את מפת העולם החדשה. שמחד שמא יחליט בפיש לחיכנס בו.

המאמר הראשי של ניוז ויק עוסק בהתפכחותה של אירופה מחלום המולטי קולטוראליזם, עם סלידה ושנאת עמוקות לאיסלאם חתוקפני. לפני כשנתיים היתה הפגנה גדולה ברחובות לונדון, ובה ראיתי שלטים גדולים שאמרו "אנגליה לאיסלאם". על זה נאמר טוב ליהודים.

מגיע לאירופאים את כל הסבל שהאיסלאם מסוגל להעניק להם. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Baskin is new head of association for retired rabbis

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus at Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom, has been elected president of the National Association of Retired Reform Rabbis (NAORRR) for a one-year term.

Rabbi Baskin, The CJN's book columnist, becomes the first Canadian to head the 23-year-old association, whose 250 members hail from across Canada and the United States.

Rabbi Bernard Baskin

Rabbi Baskin has received many honours over the years – including the B'nai Brith Humanitarian Award for his interfaith activities and an honorary doctor of laws degree from McMaster University in 1969, as well as being named to Hamilton's "Gallery of Distinction" in 1990 – but he said that "to be honoured by one's colleagues is the highest kind of accolade."

The New Jersey-born rabbi, whose father was also a rabbi, graduated from Brooklyn College and received a master's of Hebrew literature and a doctor of divinity degree from Hebrew Union College in New York City.

After holding several rabbinical posts in the United States, in 1949 he became spiritual leader at Temple Anshe Sholom, Canada's oldest Reform congregation, where he served for 40 years and became the congregation's longest serving rabbi. Following his retirement, he became a part-time rabbi with Temple Am Shalom in Barrie.

His wife and three children joined him in Scottsdale, Ariz., last month at NAORRR's annual convention, where he was named to his new position at the group's annual gala banquet.

As president, Rabbi Baskin will help organize next year's conference in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

"It's an honorary position which involves… running the show when you're president," he said.

The conventions aim to foster fellowship and a "renewal of ties and friendship," Rabbi Baskin said.

They also cultivate learning. A scholar, often from Hebrew Union College's Jewish Institute of Religion in New York, delivers several lectures on a particular topic, and forums allow the rabbis to discuss "different aspects of Jewish history, theology or other matters of concern," he said.

The conferences also deal with practical matters, such as the status of the rabbinical health and pension plans. "We have people come in who are experts and provide us with advice about money, health, personal concerns, relations with colleagues and so forth," the rabbi said.

He noted that NAORRR's initiatives include a fund to help indigent rabbis and their widows, and it has also sponsored Argentine refugees to come to the United States.

But NAORRR conferences also contain an aspect of fun: the association holds a lottery for rabbis who wish to serve as chaplains on cruises during Passover, Chanukah or the High Holy Days, Rabbi Baskin said.

Manitoba, Israeli high schoolers pursue joint scientific research

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A new pilot program is bringing together high school students in northern Israel with their counterparts in rural Manitoba to study the effects of fermentation.

The Manitoba-Israel Life Sciences Project – partly funded by the provincial Department of Energy, Science and Technology – is an extension of the five-year-old Partnership 2000 program, which links Winnipeg's Jewish schools and schools in Kiryat Shmonah and other towns in northern Israel through student and teacher exchanges, as well as e-mail, letters and videoconferences.

The Life Sciences Project is being co-ordinated in Israel by Uri Marchaim and Dina Bartfeld of the Association for the Advancement of Science Education (AASE) in the Galilee – which serves more than 5,000 students at some 30 Galilee-area high schools – and by former high school science teachers Norm Lee and Bob Brown of MindSet, the Manitoba Network for Science and Technology.

The project involves a study of fermentation and energy crops by students at the Lord Selkirk Regional Comprehensive High School in Selkirk, Man., a town of about 10,000 people about a ½-hour drive north of Winnipeg.

The school was chosen, Brown said, because the students and science teacher involved were starting a unit on the subject and were eager to participate in the pilot program, and Israeli students were found who were also interested.

Bartfeld and Brown visited Selkirk in early February to finalize arrangements. Four teams of students from each side will be participating in the research.

"The students will be using videoconferencing and e-mail to stay in touch with each other," Brown said.

"We hope to have the project done by the end of the school year. Everyone is excited about the chance to collaborate and do good research. They will be learning as they go, and we think they will have a lot of fun. We hope some of them will decide to stay in touch and pursue further joint research projects."

The Manitoba Israel Life Sciences Project grew out of a visit to Israel in November 2003 by then provincial trade minister MaryAnn Mihychuk.

She went to Israel as part of a Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal mission to Israel, one of several over the past four years.

Mihychuk, who has an interest in science, learned of joint scientific research programs linking Israeli students with students in Palm Beach, Fla., and Recife in Brazil, and she threw her support behind a similar program linking Israeli and Manitoba students.

Salutin is stuck in a rut when it comes to Israel

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

It's often hard to follow Globe and Mail contributor Rick Salutin as he navigates around his favourite foreign policy topic – Israel and the U.S.-Israel alliance. His "arguments" are usually less examples of tight reasoning than they are streams of consciousness, with sentences seemingly strung together in non-sequiturs.

Take, for instance, his Feb. 25 column, "My strange, insecure dream." By his third paragraph, Salutin has latched on to his pet theme. Quoting U.S. President George W. Bush ("If I was the leader of Israel… I'd be concerned about Iran having a nuclear weapon… We will support Israel… if their security is threatened"), Salutin concludes, "This will be read everywhere as encouraging Israel to bomb Iran, as it bombed Iraq for its nuclear program in 1981."

Everywhere? Gross exaggeration may be an effective rhetorical device, but it's no substitute for sound reasoning. The reality is that Iran has repeatedly threatened over the years to incinerate the Jewish state, with which it has no border, and indeed no relations at all except for its blinding, irrational hatred. Nuclear weapons in the hands of the clique of mullahs who firmly run Iran are a nightmare, but one that Salutin is evidently unprepared to contemplate for even a moment in his perpetually dream-like state, in which Israel is to blame for all the region's ills.

Speaking of blaming Israel, Salutin then pleads: "I am simply noting that everyone, including U.S. experts, says all-out U.S. support for Israel is the strongest factor fuelling 'Islamic resentment.'"

Everyone? Perhaps everyone Salutin cares to read. On the other hand, there's an impressive body of opinion that says many Arab and Muslim leaders use Israel as a convenient way to avoid facing up to their failures. But sooner or later they will have to deal with the desire for freedom that their own people are beginning to express (in Iraq and Lebanon, for instance).

While acknowledging that U.S. support for Israel "has become the Achilles' heel of America's relations not only with the Arabs but with the wider Moslem world," The Economist (Feb. 12) correctly noted that "Contrary to common wisdom, Palestine is not the fount of that region's problems, most of which stem from a deeper failure of politics in Arab countries."

As Timothy Garton Ash, a highly respected British journalist/academic recently put it, "'Freedom from want' matters; more important by far is the want of freedom." (Guardian Weekly, Feb. 18-24)

Salutin's line, "The fact that Israel has had nuclear bombs for decades increases the rage [in the Islamic world]" is a howler. What may have increased is the Islamic world's envy at Israel's scientific and technological achievements – not its rage, except as manufactured in the anti-Israel propaganda mills of various Arab and Islamic regimes and their supporters elsewhere.

Anyone who has travelled to Egypt and Jordan, for instance, knows that most people there have not lost a night's sleep worrying that Israel – which reportedly has had nuclear weapons since the early 1960s as a defence against the threat of an all-out attack by the combined forces of Arab states – would use its nuclear capability in a first strike. But even Arab states would indeed worry, along with Israel, if Iran were to acquire nuclear arms (it has already tested ballistic missiles capable of delivering them).

Salutin's constant assaults on Israel represent old and rigidly ideological thinking.

Some movement for reform is beginning in parts of the Arab world, sparked by events unrelated to Israel, but it's progressing ever so slowly in the direction of the freedoms that Israel has represented since its founding.

Major elements of the Canadian media now recognize this push for change. Is it unrealistic to expect Salutin himself to one day wake up to these new realities?

Syria to pull back to Bekaa by end of March

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syria will pull its forces in Lebanon back to eastern Bekaa by the end of March, the presidents of Syria and Lebanon announced Monday. However, the two leaders deferred a decision on a complete Syrian withdrawal to a later date.

The announcement came after a meeting between Syrian President Bashar Assad and Lebanese President Emile Lahoud on the details of a two-phased Syrian troop withdrawal from Lebanon.

The agreement did not set a specific timetable for complete withdrawal, which could fall short of international demands that Syria completely pull its troops from its eastern neighbour.

However, it stated: "The Syrian and Lebanese agree on continuing the withdrawal of Syrian Arab forces."

According to the announcement, a joint military committee will be designated to draw an agreement in a "maximum" one-month period from the date of withdrawal to the Bekaa "to define the size and duration of the presence of the Syrian forces" and establish the relationship between these forces and Lebanese authorities.

"At the end of the agreed upon duration for the presence of Syrian forces," the announcement said, "the governments of Syria and Lebanon will agree on completion of the withdrawal of the remaining Syrian forces."

Lebanon's exiled opposition leader and former general Michel Aoun dismissed the move, calling it "manoeuvring to win time," while France and Germany renewed calls Monday for a full and complete withdrawal of Syrian troops and services as soon as possible.

Facing intense international pressure, Assad announced plans last Saturday for a complete withdrawal of troops from Lebanon but said Damascus would still play a role in its smaller neighbour.

The United States has been wary of Assad's plans. The White House said on Sunday that, with its allies, it would not stand by as Assad takes "half measures" in Lebanon, promising to step up pressure for a complete and immediate withdrawal by May elections.

And in remarks broadcast Monday, Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said Syria would be forced to pull its troops from Lebanon before May.

"Bashar Assad will not be able to duck out of pulling the Syrian forces out of Lebanon" prior to May elections there, Mofaz said.

"It will allow the citizens of Lebanon to choose a government which is not a Syrian puppet government, rather a sovereign Lebanese government, which can confer its sovereignty on all of Lebanon, including the south, where Hezbollah today rules."

Meanwhile, Israel responded skeptically to reports that Damascus allegedly instructed senior Islamic Jihad and Hamas leaders to leave Syria following the suicide attack carried out by Jihad members from the West Bank at the Stage club in Tel Aviv last month.

Britain's Sunday Telegraph reported that the Syrians had expelled Jihad's general director Ramadan Shallah and Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal. The paper quoted the PLO's representative in Damascus as saying the offices of both groups had been closed and their phone lines disconnected.

Intelligence sources in Israel said Syria had played a similar trick in the past, noting that senior Islamic leaders had never actually left Damascus, but had simply lowered their profile until controversy quieted down.

The Israeli security establishment estimates that Islamic Jihad's Damascus headquarters invested some $30,000 (US) in the Tel Aviv attack, most of which went toward operating the network of people involved.

Intelligence sources believe Shallah knew in advance about the attack, but wanted to avoid taking responsibility for it for fear it would complicate Jihad's relationship with Syria.

Senior officials in the Gazan faction of Jihad, on the other hand, spoke recently in favour of a temporary cessation of terror attacks, at least within Israel's pre-1967 Green Line borders.

In other developments, the London-based Asharq al-Awsat newspaper reported that Spanish representatives met in Lebanon and Damascus with Hamas operatives to discuss the possibility of removing the group from the European Union's list of terrorist organization. The EU added Hamas to its list of terror groups about two years ago.

Withdraw Iranian Guard: Israel

By ZE'EV SCHIFF

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

Israel has informed a number of countries, including the United States and France, that the demand for the withdrawal of Syrian forces from Lebanon, in keeping with the UN Security Council decision, will not be complete if it doesn't also lead to the departure of Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps members, who have been in Lebanon for a long time and are providing assistance to Hezbollah's military wing.

Israel's official position is that the Syrian forces deployed in Lebanon are not the only foreign army in that country. Despite the fact that the Syrian force is a large one, and includes numerous units and an extensive intelligence apparatus, the Iranian Revolutionary Guards play a significant and negative military role in Lebanon – a role that undermines Lebanese sovereignty.

The individuals in question are a group of dozens, perhaps more, of Iranian military officers and experts.

Unlike the overt Syrian military presence, the members of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard keep a low profile. Iranians questioned on this presence have said the group consists only of medical personnel who are there to provide medical logistics assistance and the like.

But reports indicate that the Iranian officers and experts have provided operational assistance to Hezbollah, and have even patrolled along the Israeli border with Hezbollah operatives.

Furthermore, an Iranian-made drone, which, according to Hezbollah sources, was recently sent on a reconnaissance mission over Israeli territory, took photographs above Israeli territory before crashing on its way back to Lebanon.

The Iranian explanation after the incident was that, if they wanted to, they could send an unmanned aerial vehicle armed with explosives into Israel.

In addition, it is well known that the Iranian experts are involved in the array in southern Lebanon of long-range Fajr rockets that threaten Israel. These are Iranian-made rockets that were given to Hezbollah together with numerous other military supplies. Members of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard were involved in setting up Hezbollah's rocket formation.

Israeli officials have also informed Egypt of the government's position.

While the withdrawal of the Syrian forces from Lebanon depends first and foremost on a decision by Damascus if and when to respond to the Security Council's demands, the demand for the withdrawal of the Revolutionary Guards must come initially from the Lebanese government and must be directed at Tehran.

According to assessments, the withdrawal of the Syrian forces from Lebanon will boost Hezbollah's weight as a military organization, leading in turn to a broader role for the Iranian Revolutionary Guards in that country. The Lebanese army has no direct link to the Iranian activities in Lebanon, just as it has no control over arms shipments from Iran to Hezbollah.

London mayor calls Sharon a war criminal

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — The dispute between London Mayor Ken Livingstone and Britain's Jewish leaders was reignited last week when Livingstone branded Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon a war criminal.

In a March 4 opinion piece for the Guardian newspaper, Livingstone launched a provocative critique of Israel with accusations of "ethnic cleansing" and demonizing Muslims before calling for the imprisonment of Sharon.

He also claimed in his article that the Israeli government presented a "wholly distorted picture of racism and religious discrimination in Europe in order to convey the impression that Jews suffer most discrimination.

"The reality is that the great bulk of racist attacks in Europe today are on black people, Asians and Muslims – and they are the primary targets of the extreme right," Livingstone wrote.

The article came two weeks after the London mayor controversially likened a Jewish reporter to a Nazi concentration camp guard.

Livingstone has refused to apologize for his comments, repeatedly emphasizing his anti-racist stance and denying that his words were anti-Semitic.

Ken Livingstone

The comments on Israel in the Guardian were a written response to criticism levelled at him by the Board of Deputies of British Jews.

"Israel's expansion includes ethnic cleansing," he wrote. "Palestinians who had lived in that land for centuries were driven out by systematic violence and terror aimed at ethnically cleansing what became a large part of the Israeli state."

He added: "Today the Israeli government continues seizures of Palestinian land for settlements, military incursions into surrounding countries and denial of the right of Palestinians expelled by terror to return.

"Ariel Sharon, Israel's prime minister, is a war criminal who should be in prison not in office."

Israel's ambassador to Britain, Zvi Heifetz, accused Livingstone of trying to "divert attention" from public criticism he has faced over the last few months and of inflaming "prejudice and hatred" between Israelis and Palestinians.

"It is obvious and unfortunate that the mayor is trying to manipulate public opinion and divert attention from the overwhelming criticism he has faced over the last few months," Heifetz said.

Sharon, the ambassador added, was being "commended by all, including Arab leaders, for his courageous actions toward peace. The mayor's defamatory views inflame prejudice and hatred between Israelis and Palestinians and serve only his private political agenda."

Livingstone's comments are unlikely to ease already fraught relations between him and Britain's Jewish community.

Tensions came to light last year when he invited the Muslim cleric Yusuf al-Qaradawi to speak at a conference in London, the Independent newspaper reported.

However, at the crux of the current conflict are comments made last month by the mayor to Finegold, a reporter at the Evening Standard. His refusal to apologize for his remarks led to a media storm that culminated in the demand by Heifetz for an apology for "abusing" the memory of the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

"By using such flippant language, Livingstone not only seriously abused the memories of all those Jews who survived the concentration camps, but also the British troops who died fighting the Nazis and their families," Heifetz said.

Livingstone has stood by his decision that he was not going to apologize for his words. At one stage, he said that his words were "not intended to cause offence" and that he had no intention of trivializing the Holocaust. But he added: "The form of words I have used are right. I have nothing to apologize for."

There was again no sign of an apology in Livingstone's latest comments.

A spokesperson for the Board of Deputies told The Guardian: "Once again the mayor has shown an inability to understand and show consideration for the Jewish community."

Survey shows 60,000 French Jews interested in moving to Israel

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Some 60,000 French Jews are interested in immigrating to Israel, according to research done by Dr. Arik Cohen at Bar-Ilan University.

Questionnaires were given to 125,000 Jewish tourists from France who visited Israel last summer, a figure that represents one-third of the total population of French Jews.

Of those asked, 52 per cent said they see their future in Israel. Half of those aged 15 to 18 said they had personally experienced instances of anti-Semitism in the past four years. A third of the young people said they are considering immigration to Israel in the near future.

The findings were presented at a press conference in Jerusalem last Thursday, where the inauguration of an organization of French Jewry called AMI (literally "friend") was announced. The group will work toward increasing Jewish immigration from France.

In the past year, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has called on French Jewry to immigrate to Israel, a move that angered the French government and a number of Jewish community leaders in France.

Sallai Meridor, the chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel, said Thursday that AMI shows French Jewry's support for immigration to Israel.

The organization's budget for 2005 is $1.5 million (US), donated by high-tech mogul Pierre Besanano.

In the past three years, only 7,000 French Jews immigrated to Israel. AMI officials argue that many French Jews avoid immigration because of the difficulties experienced during their absorption, particularly in finding jobs.

Likud rebuffs Sharon

The Likud Central Committee voted overwhelmingly last week to urge the party's lawmakers to demand a referendum on the Gaza withdrawal plan. But Prime Minister Ariel Sharon pledged to resist the call. "The cabinet and Parliament made decisions and these decisions will be carried out," Sharon said over catcalls from the crowd, referring to withdrawals from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank slated to begin July 20. "I will not let the extreme fringes dictate the way forward." The vote was expected to have little political impact, given the lack of support for a referendum among Knesset members.

Attempted Nablus violence

Palestinian terrorists tried to bomb Israeli troops operating in the West Bank. No one was hurt in last week's attacks around Nablus. Israeli media quoted military commanders as saying tougher Palestinian Authority crackdowns were required. In one incident, a bomb exploded just after Jewish worshippers arrived at Joseph's Tomb. In the nearby Balata refugee camp, two explosive devices were detonated as troops carried out searches. In an apparent move to calm Israeli concerns, the PA said its security forces had arrested several Islamic Jihad members in connection with the recent suicide bombing in Tel Aviv.

Eichmann kidnapper dies

Peter Zvi Malkin, a Mossad agent who helped bring Adolf Eichmann to trial in Israel, died last week at age 77 in New York. His body was to be flown to Israel for burial by the Israeli government. Malkin helped kidnap the Nazi war criminal in Argentina by punching him and shoving him into a car, then guarding him in a Buenos Aires apartment until he was flown to Israel for trial.

Ramon's diary restored

Forensic scientists restored part of the diary of the Israeli astronaut who died in the Columbia shuttle tragedy. Eighteen pages handwritten in Hebrew by Col. Ilan Ramon were recovered, though some of them were in tatters or virtually illegible. With the help of technology, Sharon Brown, an Israeli police document examiner, was able to piece together much of the diary. The find includes four pages of Ramon's in-flight diary. Ramon was one of seven Columbia crew members who died in the Feb. 1, 2003, crash.

Portman's Regret

Actor Natalie Portman admits it was a mistake to film a romantic scene last month near the Western Wall. "I really don't want to offend anyone's beliefs or impose anything on anyone, and it was mistaken to do it," Portman told Access Hollywood last week, referring to an on-camera kiss with Israeli heartthrob Aki Avni for the independent Israeli film Free Zone. The crew had to relocate after protests from haredi Jews.

Sharon, Bush to meet again

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will meet U.S. President George W. Bush in Washington on April 12, Israeli sources told Ha'aretz. The summit is expected to follow a separate meeting between Bush and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas next month and to focus on peacemaking efforts, the sources said. The Bush administration initially wanted Sharon to visit Washington later this month, but he declined, citing a crucial March 17 Knesset vote on the 2005 budget. Bush and Sharon have met nine times while serving as their nations' chief executives. Abbas' visit to Washington will be his first as PA president.

Ginat Eden a haven for girls 'at risk'

By ELI STUTZ

GINAT EDEN, Israel — What do a few sheds and a bunch of ducks and sheep have to do with saving young lives? At Ginat Eden, a farm-school near the Dead Sea, the answer is "everything."

Israel has its share of teenagers who don't fit in at school or at home, who may be abused physically or sexually, and who then turn to life on the streets. On the streets, they drink and/or take drugs, and are vulnerable to abuse, disease and even early death.

The Israeli government, along with other public and private institutions working to meet this problem head on, has established schools for teens at risk. Unfortunately, while there are several such schools for boys, there are none for girls.

Judith Berger, a Jerusalem nurse, became aware of this gap the hard way, through personal experience as an adoptive mother. "My daughter couldn't quite answer the question of 'who am I?' She's in the process of finding herself," she said. Scouring the country for an alternative high school that would address her daughter's special needs, she came up empty-handed. That's when she heard about Ginat Eden, a farm-school set up as a haven for teenage girls at risk.

Ginat Eden, meaning the 'small garden of Eden," was established by Rabbi Nir and Nava Efrati. The Efratis are a young couple with four kids, who decided to move from a comfortable Jerusalem suburb to the Jordan Valley desert, after Nava's school for girls at risk was abruptly closed down. There, they set up a ramshackle farm and opened their home to girls from various backgrounds who were living on the streets. Far away from the city, from the temptations of drugs and from those who would take advantage of them, these girls are now on a slow path to recovery.

Miriam never told anyone that she was beaten regularly while growing up. At school, she was labelled learning disabled. Unable to control her surroundings, Miriam controlled the only thing she could: her eating. By age 15, she was severely anorexic. Therapist after therapist tried to help her, but to no avail. Miriam started hanging out on the streets, where she experimented with drugs.

Miriam heard about Ginat Eden on the streets and was desperate enough to give it a try. Today, she has successfully completed some matriculation exams. She trusts the Ginat Eden staff enough to reveal details of her ordeals. At Ginat Eden, she feels safe enough to eat – and sleep.

Rabbi Nir and Nava Efrati's farm-school at Ginat Eden gives troubled girls who have lived on the streets the opportunity to improve their physical and mental health.

"The daily schedule at Ginat Eden has been constructed with both physical and mental health in mind," says Berger. "The students split their day between studying fashion design, learning self- defence, participating in group therapy and working with their hands to improve their living conditions. Each of the girls adopts a farm animal. These consist of puppies, ducks, geese and sheep."

There are plans for a self-sufficient farm in the future, Berger says. "Our dream is to have a goat farm, and to produce and sell labane and goat cheese."

Berger says that it's not just the classes that help the girls recover. "There are positive forces where they are. The location itself is very healing. It's the nothingness of the desert. There's nothing to get in the way of finding yourself. Also, the Efrati family is a great role model."

Berger was so impressed by her experience with Ginat Eden and its effect on her daughter, that she decided to get more involved. Today, she spends her time fundraising for the farm.

One would think that such a school would be eligible for government funding, but Berger says not yet. "A school must establish itself for two years and receive private funding before the government can step in. That's why we're desperate for funds."

But Berger believes the effort is worth it. "What you have to understand is that Ginat Eden is saving these girls. Yesterday they had no reason to get out of bed; today, they do. That's the difference between life and death."

Abbas must dedicate himself to building free society

For many policy-makers, a free society for the Palestinians has little to do with the demands of peace. What is advocated instead is a policy that will strengthen the "moderate" Abbas so that he can fight extremists and make a deal with Israel. But merely replacing Arafat with Abbas will not turn a failed Oslo formula into a success.

Oslo failed because it was based on the premise that a strong dictator would make a strong peace. What Oslo's architects did not understand was that dictators need external enemies to justify the repression necessary to keep their societies under control. In contrast, democratic leaders, dependent on popular support, have a powerful incentive to deliver peace and prosperity to their citizens.

In order to avoid the mistakes of the past, Canada, the United States and other leading democracies must make it clear that they will support Abbas only if he dedicates himself to building a free society – replacing Arafat's fear society. If Abbas is a willing partner in this effort, his government should receive legitimacy, financial aid, territory and support for statehood. But if he is unwilling to do so, all support for his regime should be withheld.

In addition to taking concrete action to disarm the terrorists – terrorists are sure to oppose changes that will dismantle the fear in which they flourish – the free world should focus on four areas of reform required of the PA.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas

• Dissent: Under Arafat, the only freedom of speech or press was the freedom to criticize Israel. Abbas must understand that the days of crushing democratic dissent are over. If Palestinian democrats know that the free world will not allow the PA to act toward them with impunity, then an increasing number of democratic voices will be heard.

• Education and incitement: In any society, what is taught in public schools and broadcast on public airwaves is a good indication of the values that are being inculcated in its people. PA-run schools and the PA-controlled media have been used to poison a generation of Palestinians against Jews and Israel. The free world must demand that this end immediately.

• Refugee camps: A PA dedicated to bettering the lives of its citizens will immediately seek to address the miserable conditions of Palestinians who have been living in refugee camps for four generations. A PA interested only in controlling its subjects will prefer to continue to use these Palestinians as pawns in a political struggle against the Jewish state by feeding fantasies that they will return to pre-1967 Israel.

Canada, in particular, which is a significant supporter of United Nations Relief and Works Agency, should push the PA to support a program that begins to move refugees out of the camps and/or provides decent housing for those living in the camps. A PA leadership that rejects such a plan is not interested in the welfare of its own people and hence not a partner for peace.

• Economic independence: In a fear society, people are cogs of the regime. That is why one of the anchors of a free society is a middle class not dependent on government largess. With a monopoly over basic industries, and the power to decide who receives work permits to Israel and who receives international assistance, the PA has a stranglehold over the Palestinian economy. Money sent is used to fund terrorism and corruption rather than to improve lives.

While I have long advocated a new Marshall Plan for the Palestinians, the success of such a plan will depend on ensuring that money is invested only in projects that directly benefit the Palestinians. That will help them re-establish the middle class that is so essential for their future.

No doubt, the success of any effort to help the Palestinians build a free society will depend in large measure on the Palestinians themselves. For its part, Israel must do everything – and it is – to support a PA that is dedicated to improving the lives of its citizens.

But the rest of the free world also has a role. By linking its policies toward the PA to the expansion of freedom within Palestinian society, it can encourage Abbas to make the only choice that will give peace a chance.

Security guard was covered in blood

At first they thought it was a kitchen accident or some other mundane occurrence, but the reality of what had happened quickly became apparent as one of the club's security guards staggered up the stairs to the gallery. He had been hit by shrapnel and was covered in blood.

The security guard was one of dozens of Israelis injured in the explosion, which shattered the tenuous ceasefire established in the wake of the election of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. The suicide attack, now attributed to Islamic Jihad, ripped through a group of club-goers who were out for an evening's entertainment at The Stage, a trendy karaoke bar near Hayarkon and Allenby streets.

Five people were killed and dozens wounded, many seriously, but Nissin Botbol and the rest of the staff consider themselves lucky to have avoided injury.

Botbol, 24, is one of the bartenders at the club. A former captain of the Israeli national junior hockey team, he was sitting with other staff listening to their boss, known to them simply as Abulafia, discussing new cocktails they were going to introduce to the club's patrons, many of them local artists and musicians.

Botbol had been close to a terrorist attack before – four years ago in Rishon Lezion a smaller bomb went off 100 metres away – but never as close as he was at The Stage.

The suicide bombing outside the nightclub in the middle of a crowd of people waiting to enter, created a hell on earth, he said.

At the urging of the security guard, Botbol and the others grabbed water bottles and headed downstairs to help the wounded. Racing down to street level, Botbol found a scene of carnage. He saw bloody bodies with their arms blown off. In one spot, he saw a severed leg that authorities later identified as belonging to the suicide attacker.

"The first thing I saw was hell," he said. "It was all dark, a lot of yelling. I saw a young woman's body in front of me. I saw the suicide bomber's leg. People lost arms in the attack.

"I couldn't stand it for too long. It was a really shocking sight," said Botbol, who served a stint in the Israeli Defence Forces.

One of the waitresses "saw the bodies and got into trauma shock," he said. Police and emergency crews arrived quickly and ushered the staff out of the building. They were worried about another bomb, Botbol said.

The suicide bomber, it turned out, had been accompanied by two other men. A story began circulating about the events leading up to the attack. Botbol said he learned the three had been lurking outside the club since at least 9:30, waiting for the place to open.

Nearby, a kiosk owner noticed the trio staring at the club and asked them in Hebrew, "Can I help you?" Botbol recounted.

"No thank you," one of the men replied.

"Have a good night," the shop owner said.

"Don't worry, we'll have a great night," came the reply.

The owner of the kiosk never suspected the men were planning a suicide attack, Botbol said. He survived the explosion by chance. When the bomb went off, he was working in the back of his shop, behind a wall that protected him from the explosion.

Despite the incident, The Stage reopened last Thursday, six days after the attack.

"We have a lot of artists who volunteered to come and keep the place open," Botbol said.

All the staff returned but one, the traumatized waitress. The others, who hang together and are like a big family, are still trying to convince her to return, he said.

Abulafia – "a great guy," said Botbol – brought in trauma counsellors to help the staff cope with what they'd seen.

They never expected to be the target of a terror attack, he said. "Abulafia owns The Stage and we thought, he's an Arab Muslim and we thought nothing would happen to us, but we were wrong."

Abulafia also arranged a trip to a spa, an evening of bowling and a dinner at the renowned Jaffa eatery named after him.

The events "helped relax the body and the mind," Botbol said.

The counselling "brings you back to reality. You always have thoughts – what would have happened if I was downstairs or if he got into the place?

"It clears your mind and it tells you you have to get on with life," he said.

Ifrah's narrow brush with death has changed her, she said. As Botbol interpreted her remarks over the phone, Ifrah said "she feels like she was reborn, like she got her life back. She said she feels like she received a present.

"She said she looks at life in a different way, that what happened changed her point of view of life. She thinks in other proportions. She wants to take the maximum from every day she's here."

Despite the incident, The Stage reopened last Thursday, six days after the attack

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 10 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 30, 2005 at Beth Emeth Synagogue. It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m. This year Ines Di Santo will be presenting their 2005 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

Rabbinical group calls for change to traditional milah practice

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) has issued a statement urging mohelim – those who perform ritual circumcisions – to perform the suction portion of the brit milah using a sterile tube and to avoid direct contact between the mohel's mouth and the infant.

The New York-based RCA, which serves more than 1,000 Orthodox rabbis in the United States and Canada, said there are no religious or medical reasons to avoid using a tube to perform the "metzitzah be'peh," the suctioning of the wound that is part of ritual circumcisions.

"Based upon a careful study of the available halachic [religious legal] and scientific literature, as well as a review of sanctioned practice by numerous reliable Torah authorities past and present, it is the position of the RCA that the requirement of metzitzah is fulfilled completely and unambiguously by the use of oral suctioning through a tube, as practised by many mohelim in our communities. Therefore, according to this viewpoint, the use of such a tube is not only permissible, but is preferred instead of direct oral contact to eliminate any unintentional communication of infectious diseases. This protects both the mohel and the newly circumcised child," the statement said.

The rabbis note use of a tube might also encourage "less committed Jewish men and women" to have their children circumcised.

Rabbi Basil Herring, executive vice-president of the RCA, said the council had been aware of the issue for some time and had been developing a response to concerns about it. But a string of news reports in New York that linked an Orthodox mohel to the transmission of herpes to three infants, one of whom died, provided "the immediate impetus."

Health officials in New York recently asked Rabbi Yitzchok Fischer to stop performing circumcisions after he was linked to three children who contracted herpes. Rabbi Fischer, who performed 350 circumcisions in the New York area, employed the traditional metzitzah be'peh.

Rabbi Fischer, 66, performed a brit milah on twins in October 2004. Ten days later, one infant died of herpes and the other tested positive for the virus. A third infant on Staten Island also tested positive for herpes. The rabbi's lawyer suggested the babies might have contracted herpes in another manner.

Use of tube is encouraged

The custom of metzitzah be'peh came under attack last summer when a group of Canadian and Israeli researchers, backed by Rabbi Moshe Tendler, a renowned New York talmudic authority, recommended that a sterile tube be used instead. The researchers found eight babies who were infected with the herpes virus likely contracted their illnesses through oral metzitzah. One of the infants was born in Toronto in 1994.

Rabbi Herring said in urging mohelim to employ sterile tubes, the RCA believes it is complying with Halachah.

"Jewish law and Jewish tradition are the guiding lights of our lives and we absolutely believe there is nothing in Jewish law that would prevent good health practices," he said.

The RCA's recommendation, he continued, "makes sure our practices as Jews are both in conformity with the highest standards of Jewish law and with current knowledge. Happily, in this case, they come together."

Dr. Gideon Koren, one of the researchers who published a report last summer on the health hazards of traditional metzitzah, said the RCA statement did not go far enough. "They should have banned it," he said.

"I personally don't think the word 'preferred' is good enough. If even one Jewish child contracts herpes, it's not justified. It's a medical no-no. You just don't do it. I don't think there should be any contact.

"You can do the metzitzah mitzvah [commandment] with a tube. Therefore, the logical result is that [employing the mouth] should be banned," said Koren, a professor in the department of clinical pharmacology and toxicology at the Hospital for Sick Children and the University of Toronto.

"As a relatively secular Jew, I was not aware of oral metzitzah and when I learned of it, I was shocked… I don't think any truly informed parent, knowing of the chance of brain damage [from herpes] would accept the risk," he added.

Rabbi Herring said the language employed in the RCA statement was relatively strong, though he acknowledged the council could have said use of a tube is "mandatory."

But the RCA has no power to compel anyone to do anything, he said. "This is not the Catholic Church. We don't issue directives that recognized rabbis have to follow. We can only recommend."

The RCA "recognizes there are other viewpoints out there and they have the right to follow their own way."

Rabbi Moshe Shulman, who has performed brits for 14 years, said the RCA's statement correctly balances traditional practices with current medical thinking.

The Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where Rabbi Shulman is spiritual leader, has maintained a policy for at least seven years that does not permit metzitzah be'peh for circumcisions performed on its premises.

He acknowledged there are a minority of halachic authorities who argue that using a glass tube does not fulfill the requirements of circumcision.

"It's a very difficult decision," he said. "You're dealing with a change of tradition that has sanctity and with halachic issues, so you have to take that into consideration."

But, the traditional practice of circumcision has changed greatly over the years, he continued.

Flat shields were introduced to place a barrier between the foreskin and the glans (penis) to protect the penis from the scalpel. "That goes back centuries, but at one point, it was an innovation," Rabbi Shulman said.

Many mohelim today employ a topical anesthetic and instruments used in the procedure are now routinely sterilized. Both practices marked changes from ancient practice, he said.

Rabbi Shulman said he believed most circumcisions performed in Toronto involve metzitzah using a sterile implement.

Toronto's Vaad Harabonim was not available for comment, but last summer, when the medical report on metzitzah be'peh was published, Rabbi Moshe Mordechai Lowy, a spokesperson for the Va'ad Harabonim said, "Those in the Torah world, the yeshiva world, use the procedure, unless there's a problem."

He said that "haredim or those who feel they still want to go with the old way of thousands of years [of tradition] and they feel the mohel is careful" accept oral metzitzah. He mentioned Satmar, Bobov, Lubavitch and others as examples of communities who generally use the traditional method.

In 1994, when a Toronto baby became sick with herpes transmitted from a mohel, the Va'ad Harabonim investigated and issued a brief statement saying "there is no clinical basis in ceasing to perform metzitzah be'peh." However, the Va'ad also said that if the mohel exhibits cold sores, lesions or flu, oral metzitzah should be avoided, Rabbi Lowy added.

Correction

The number of people affected by multiple myeloma in the United States each year was incorrectly stated in "Chemist helped develop cancer and HIV wonder drugs," (CJN, March 3). Nearly 15,000 people are newly diagnosed annually and about 11,000 die each year, according to the International Myeloma Foundation.

Right-wing rapper Subliminal tops Israel's hip-hop hierarchy

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

During a short recording break, Israeli rapper Subliminal calls me in Toronto.

"I love Canada," he says cheerfully, and then names off a few of his fellow Canadian wordsmiths. "I know Choclair, Butterbaby, oh and K-os. I love K-os."

In Israel's hip-hop hierarchy, there's no one hotter than Subliminal. He's got his own clothing and jewelry lines, he owns five clubs and a record label and sells out show after show.

If he were an American rapper, he'd be as big as LL Cool J or Jay-Z, but unlike many of rap's big stars who grew up in poor ghettos, he's just a 25-year-old half-Persian, half-Tanzanian Israeli kid. In a hip-hop world filled with bling bling and drive-by shootings, Subliminal – with a giant gold Star of David necklace – doesn't exactly scream "gangsta." Fortunately, Subliminal, whose real name is Kobi Shimoni, doesn't think this is a problem.

"Hip-hop is about expressing your reality, and I don't think I have to be black or have to run away from the cops, or smoke and use drugs in order to have something to rap about," he says.

While his favourite American artists draw from their experiences on the streets, Subliminal draws on his time in the Israeli Defence Forces for some of his material.

"I was in the army, so my life in here has a lot of influence from heaven and hell, too," he says. "My day-to-day life has enough stories for me to speak about. By the age of 20, I had already been through things that most people don't go through in their whole life. The thing most important in hip-hop is your story, where you're from, what you have to say."

Subliminal has never had to worry about running out of things to say. He claims he's the first Israeli musician ever to sing about politics, and his right-wing stance on most issues is the reason Israeli kids love him and the Holy Land's media can't stand him.

"One sentence in a song had a political opinion in it," says Subliminal. "The sentence was 'the whole country is shaking like a cigarette in Arafat's mouth.' It's not a big statement, but Israeli media people thought it was like a war, like a declaration or something like that. So they wanted to basically destroy me."

Other lines such as "dear God, I wish you could come down, because I'm being persecuted. My enemies are united," from the song Divide and Conquer, have drawn fire from his detractors – some call him anti-Palestinian and others have even gone as far calling him a fascist.

"In Israel the left wing of the political map tried to make a whole campaign against us, so they called us fascist and our music hatred music," he says. "It's straight up lies 'cause we're preaching for peace and we're preaching it in our slang and style."

Just as in the 1980s, when black rappers spoke out about their situation in America, Subliminal is talking about his frustration as an Israeli kid dealing with the intifadah. And like black youth in the '80s, Israeli kids are turning to hip-hop to make sense of their experiences.

"People can identify with us and can see the reality in the streets of Israel 2005 from the eyes of a young youth. You can actually see it the way people are thinking and what people are feeling on the streets in Israel."

It's only recently that the majority of Israeli kids have been exposed to rap, but Subliminal was bitten by the hip-hop bug in his early teens. His first experience with rap happened on a boat at sea.

"There was some pirate radio on this boat in the middle of the sea and they used to play all the hottest, freshest stuff from Europe," he says. "It was the beginning of all the techno and dance and all the European music."

Although Subliminal was singing along to C & C Music Factory and KLM, the young Shimoni couldn't understand a word the bands were saying. He says his English education came solely from American rhymes, and it was only after he understood the language that he began to pay attention to hip-hop's finer details.

"[After learning English] I found out it was called rap music," says Subliminal. "Then I found the CD Turn Up the Bass Vol. 1, which was a hip-hop compilation, and from the lyrics I got to understand this whole culture named hip-hop. I started recording everything, learning it by heart."

Subliminal's experiences delivering his right-wing raps in Europe have helped him understand how his country is viewed away from home.

"I visited a lot of places in the world and the only way to see what's going on at home is if you check CNN or Fox News," he says. "That made me understand how people really see the situation in the Middle East so twisted."

Subliminal

Sitting in his hotel room during a tour of Italy, Subliminal saw a newscast reporting that Israel was destroying Palestinian homes, but it didn't mention why.

"[On TV] I saw the 'Israeli occupation army going into Ramallah once again blowing up houses,' so I called my dad and said why did we go into Ramallah," says Subliminal. "He said 'oh you didn't hear'... there was a suicide bomber who committed suicide in the middle of Allenby Street. There were a lot of kids on the bus coming back from school and 11 people died, so the Israeli army went to Ramallah to blow up the terrorist bomber's house."

Besides finding out how some media view Israel, Subliminal says his tours have helped forge dialogues between him and other rappers, including some who are anti-Semitic. Instead of starting an east side/west side-like war, which has killed many American rappers, Subliminal's chosen to collaborate with the artists who disagree with his politics.

"The second we hook up together [the other rappers] truly understand our message. In the beginning when they just saw us [wearing] the Shield of David they just thought we were messengers from the devil. Then they saw the show and saw the crowd and how everybody's just hip-hop kids exactly like them and they saw me. I'm Middle Eastern, they're from the Middle East and have Middle Eastern culture. If we weren't brought up in a world with everybody telling us we should hate each other, we would probably be best friends."

Catch Subliminal and his DJ, The Shadow, in Toronto at Revival, 783 College St. W., on March 10 and in Montreal at the Metropolis on March 12.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

TEATRON AND AMICUS PRESENT THE SISTERS ROSENSWEIG

Wendy Wasserstein's popular stage play The Sisters Rosensweig, which has quickly become part of the modern Jewish theatrical repertoire, "reflects a lot of the challenges that many of us face in real life," said Ari Weisberg, director of Toronto's Teatron theatre company, which is presenting the play here in association with Amicus Productions.

The Sisters Rosensweig are three very different Jewish sisters who get together to celebrate the 54th birthday of the eldest. Joining them are a theatre director, his faux furrier friend, a British member of Parliament, a Latvian nationalist and a teenaged daughter.

"On the surface, the play is about siblings, relationships, love and anything involving that emotional cauldron called family," Weisberg observed. "But at its heart, it's a play about roots and identity."

Weisberg described the piece as a "dramatic comedy."

"It's a hilarious comedy, but it brings out some very serious questions and ideas," he said. "Many of Wasserstein's plays received great runs in New York and other places because she manages to capture the turbulent life we live in a comic way."

Fairview Library Theatre, March 10 to 19. Mature content. Tickets $16-$14. 416-781-5527.

Art That Inspires: The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care doesn't normally host shows of paintings or other art works, but it's making a rare exception in the case of Karla Goldberg, an 84-year-old Toronto artist who taught herself to use her left hand after a stroke completely paralyzed her right side two years ago. "Creative Strokes of the Brush: Karla Goldberg and her Artistic Journey Post-Stroke" consists of about 40 paintings and needleworks. It's on view in the Baycrest's main floor lobby, 3560 Bathurst St., from March 13 to 27.

Names in the News: Fox TV writer Stewart Silver brought his "clever, edgy brand of humour" to Toronto's Yuk Yuks downtown club last week. The former medical student began writing and performing comedy soon after completing his microbiology degree at Montreal's McGill University. Since moving to Toronto, he's appeared on City TV's Lunch Television, Telemedia national radio and the Toronto Comedy Festival. He's also toured extensively in Canada and the United States, and written for the Teletoon, YTV and Fox networks…

Guest violinist Pinchas Zukerman performs works by Knussen, Kulesha and Henze with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. The concerts are at Roy Thomson Hall on March 30 and 31, 8 p.m. ($105-$27; 416-593-4828) and are being recorded by the CBC for later broadcast…

Jennifer Herszman Capraru is an associate dramaturge and intern artistic director at Factory Theatre, and founder of Theatre Asylum, which produces theatre by and about women, with a focus on Jewish identity. She's also active in film and is working on a piece about Bella Chagall with Theresa Tova and Mary Kerr…

Israeli spoon-bender and mentalist Uri Geller has been named a potential witness in the Michael Jackson child-sex trial. Geller, a longtime friend of the singer, said he would give testimony in a California courtroom if required…

Toronto actor-turned-rabbi-turned-director Tracey Erin Smith is the founder of Soul-O-Theatre, which just concluded a month-long course in which students of all ages and theatrical experiences created solo performances based on aspects of their personal lives. She's currently working on a one-woman show, I Wanna Marry Jackie Mason – which Jackie Mason himself is "helping to get produced."

Ambitious Israeli film falls short of the mark

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If nothing else, Eytan Fox's thriller, Walk on Water, which opens in Toronto on March 11, is ambitious in scope.

Fox, one of Israel's finest directors, touches on a variety of interlocking themes, directly or glancingly, in this film: Palestinian terrorism, the Holocaust, neo-Nazism and homosexuality.

In the main, he rises to the challenge and generally handles the diverse material with intelligence and sensitivity. Yet one important ingredient is ultimately missing.

Walk on Water, which takes place in the present, revolves around Eyal (Lior Ashkenazi), a tough, unsentimental, thirty-something Mossad agent who's handed an assignment he doesn't quite relish: tracking down Alfred Himmelman, a Nazi war criminal believed to be hiding in Germany.

Eyal, a specialist in the elimination of Arab terrorists, hears the bad news on returning from Istanbul, where he has just dispatched his latest prey.

Though his mother was victimized by Nazism, Eyal believes Israel has more pressing business than merely bringing aging Nazi killers to justice. Eyal's boss, however, is firm in his resolve to capture Himmelman. "I want to get him before God does," he says succinctly.

Choosing the path of least resistance, Eyal

Lior Ashkenazi in Walk on Water

decides to nail Himmelman by working through his two grandchildren, Pia and Axel. Pia (Caroline Peters) is a volunteer on a kibbutz near the Dead Sea, and her gay brother, Axel (Knut Berger), is shortly due to visit her.

Pretending to be a tour guide, Eyal smartly insinuates himself into their lives. He discovers they're left-liberals who have little sympathy for their grandfather.

Fox uses Eyal's budding relationship with Pia and Axel to make fleeting observations about the Holocaust and the possibility of friendship between Jews and Germans after Hitler. He also introduces us, albeit briefly, to Tel Aviv's gay nightclub scene, where Jews and Arabs seem to mix seamlessly.

The movie, which elicits competent performances from its lead actors and unfolds against the backdrop of the current Palestinian uprising, shifts focus as Axel and Pia return to Germany to attend their grandfather's birthday bash.

As planned, Eyal shows up in Berlin. In short order, he is embroiled in fisticuffs with neo-Nazi hooligans in a subway station.

Axel, still unaware of Eyal's real identity as a Mossad operative, invites him to the party. There he spots his quarry, an old man supported by crutches. Eyal hopes to bring Himmelman to Israel to stand trial for his crimes, but Eyal's superior wants the Nazi finished off without due process.

As it reaches its denouement, Walk on Water takes several surprising turns viewers may regard as saccharin and facile. Yet these shortcomings pale in comparison to Fox's inability to inject white-knuckle tension into a film that is supposed to be a thriller.

This is an interesting picture in terms of its content and intentions. But unfortunately, it doesn't exactly set the blood racing.

Gorbachev's quiet revolution inspires local filmmaker

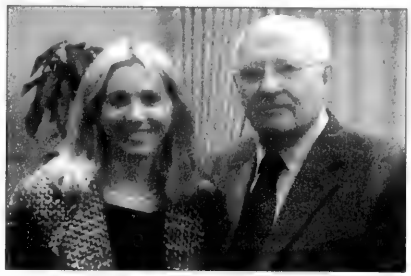
By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Filmmaker Fern Levitt loves talking about other people. That is, if she can describe dissidents and human rights activists.

Gorbachev's Revolution is her most recent film in a series on people and events that have impacted on this century. Her other documentaries have included Little Rock Nine, about nine black students who challenged segregated education in the United States by enrolling in an all-white Arkansas school, and Sakharov: Conscience of a Country, which was nominated for a 1994 Golden Sheaf award.

The film on Mikhail Gorbachev, scheduled to air March 10th on History Channel's Turning Points of History, is meant to coincide with the 20th anniversary of perestroika, a period that saw profound reform and change in the Soviet Union.

On March 11, 1985, Soviet leader Gorbachev initiated a new Soviet era by introducing glasnost (openness) and perestroika (reform) into a society that had been denied human rights for more than 70 years. He brought elections to the Soviet public, made books, music and theatre available and began a series of economic reforms that were hugely unpopular at the time.



Fern Levitt with Mikhail Gorbachev.

When choosing film topics, Levitt said that she looks for people who have managed to positively change lives by focusing attention on discriminatory policies and human rights violations.

For Levitt, Gorbachev was a perfect subject. The film, which spans the years from 1985 to the early '90s, focuses attention on the Soviet leader's efforts to end the Cold War between the Soviets and the Americans, which brought about the peaceful liberation of eastern Europe.

Film footage from that era is juxtaposed with current interviews to portray Gorbachev as a man who, as one analyst suggests, based his policies on life rather than dogma, took risks and allowed himself to evolve.

The interviews with American and Russian political advisers, former American president George Bush and ex-British prime minister Margaret Thatcher, as well as with Gorbachev himself, guide the viewer through the Soviet landscape of the 1980s as seen from within the country, as well as through the eyes of foreign experts. Levitt also focuses on Gorbachev's personal history, his clashes with the Communist Party, and the ongoing ramifications of his policies.

In October 1990, Gorbachev won the Nobel Peace Prize and became the first and only Soviet leader to be recognized for courage and humanity.

At that time, with the falling of the Berlin Wall, it felt as if "the whole world had come together. In my naive way, I thought we were really heading towards world peace," Levitt said. She wasn't the only one who felt that way. The film successfully captures those years when Gorbey-mania captured the whole world's attention.

Levitt was born in Hamilton and has a master's degree in social work from the University of Toronto. She is married to Arnie Zipursky and has three daughters, Bonnie, 18, Dayna, 15, and Farah, 11.

Her next film describes the Velvet Revolution and includes interviews with Vaclav Havel, the first president of the Czech Republic.

She said other people's stories and their quest for freedom and equality have forced her to constantly evaluate current events so that she can never be complacent to what is happening around her.

History shows what happens when you're indifferent to human rights violations, Levitt said, referring to the Holocaust, which has profoundly affected her work. "The Holocaust is proof of what happens when racism is ignored."

Through her work, Levitt said she has learned that every voice counts.
"Time has shown that although dissidents are only a minority, they are a very powerful minority."

The quiet side of klezmer

Brian Katz, famed jazz and Jewish music artist, and Jonno Lightstone, acclaimed klezmer clarinetist/flutist with Hu Tsa Tsa and The Yiddish Swingtet combine their talents to explore some rarely performed klezmer repertoire.

The inviting texture of the classical guitar and flute will especially intrigue listeners who have yet to hear the quieter side of klezmer. March 12th, Free Times Café, 320 College St., Toronto. 416-967-1078

At the Galleries

• Selfish, a showing of diverse "self-portraits" by Toronto artist Barbara McGill Balfour, is on view at the Koffler Gallery, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, until April 22. 416-636-5813.

• Twenty-one middle school and junior high students in Toronto viewed the recent "Modigliani" exhibition at the Art Gallery of Ontario, then attempted collaborative portraits of their own. "Headlines," an exhibition of their work, is sponsored by the Toronto District School Board. Art Gallery of Ontario, March 9, 6:30 p.m.

• Speaking of the AGO, the words MASSIVE CHANGE were painted over the Dundas St. institution's north façade last week. The word-mural, eight metres high and 89 metres across, is by far the largest painting ever to grace its exterior. The mural serves to highlight the opening of the exhibit "Massive Change" on March 11 as well as the AGO's own continuing transformation and expansion.

Spiritual search of inter-dating couple led to observant Judaism

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Chicken Soup with Chopsticks* by Jack Botwinik, Paper Spider Books

Many people have interdated; few of those become observant, and even fewer have written books about it. One newly released book deals with all of these, with one difference: it's about a Jewish/Chinese interdating relationship.

Chicken Soup with Chopsticks: A Jew's Struggle for Truth in an Interfaith Relationship chronicles the search for spiritual answers of a formerly secular Jew and his then-girlfriend, a Chinese gentile, culminating in their path to observant Judaism.

Author Jack Botwinik describes in eloquent detail the crises and challenges of an interfaith relationship, as he struggled with God, questioned his faith, and grappled with deep philosophical Jewish questions.

While many books have been written about Jewish/Christian interfaith relationships, Botwinik says this is the first with a Chinese aspect.

The book evolved from a journal he kept for five years that logs significant epiphanies in his life. "I realized my whole worldview was changing. I needed to make sense of what happened in my life," says the Montreal native, now living in Ottawa.

Though Botwinik had 11 years of formal Jewish education, he felt no attachment to the religious aspect of Judaism. "Like many of my peers, I often wondered of what use all this Jewish immersion would be in the long run," he writes.

At the same time, Botwinik pondered whether his decision to interdate was a symptom of a larger issue.

"Many people think not interdating is just to please the in-laws. Was it rebellion? Anger? Getting back at my parents for all those years of being forced to go to Jewish school and attend long and boring synagogue services? When someone does something unusual, it can be an indication that he or she seeks attention, honour, or fame. Was I yearning for these things?"

His quest for answers took him and Belinda to Israel for a four-week learning program with Aish HaTorah, and they steeped themselves in lectures and books. He likens the search for truth as though he were stepping into a swimming pool – "hesitant at first because the water's cold, but once I'm there, I don't feel like leaving."

Diving into texts and intense study, Botwinik examined issues scrupulously to answer the hard, profound questions he faced.

When his relationship with Belinda became serious, he was forced to consider issues he hadn't looked at before. "Would we be married in a Buddhist temple or in a synagogue? Would our final resting place be in a Chinese cemetery or a Jewish one? If Yom Kippur coincided with a Chinese festival or an important family celebration, would I be pressured to go for dim sum or would my conscience compel me to spend the day in synagogue absorbed in fasting and prayer?"

These issues and others at times caused great strain on their relationship and, for a brief time, caused a break-up.

After dabbling in various religions, cults, and belief-systems for some time, they discovered together that it was Judaism which offered clear moral choices.

"The bottom line is this: if there is no single, universal code of morality assumed to come from the Creator, then, ultimately, every person or society is free to choose or create their own moral system."

Chicken Soup with Chopsticks deftly delves into many basic Jewish values that are the bedrock of observant Judaism, such as: not speaking badly about someone whether or not it is true, dressing modestly, being sensitive to others, and continually learning.

Botwinik says the goal of Chicken Soup with Chopsticks is for people to see how he and Belinda overcame their religious challenges, in order that others in similar circumstances can benefit from their conclusions as well as be inspired to take a deeper look at religious Judaism.

One such conclusion became a turning point for him regarding interdating: "It would seem logical that one of the most important decisions in life - whom to marry - should be made in as level-headed a way and as objectively as possible."

For Belinda – who converted to Orthodox Judaism and now goes by her Jewish name, Bina Ester, actively investigating was the key to finding the right path.

"We had big questions before and we were dissecting the issues," she says, adding that her decision to espouse Judaism and its commandments took more time than she initially would have liked, because she wanted to make sure she wasn't converting simply to marry.

Botwinik is scheduled to speak in Toronto on Tuesday May 10 at the Pride of Israel Synagogue at 8 p.m. about his journey from interdating to Orthodoxy. Another speaker is Rabbi Michael Skobac of Jews for Judaism.

Their next book endeavours to address other challenging issues in Jewish life. They are welcoming submissions for their forthcoming publication, Anything is Possible: Overcoming Challenges to Jewish Observance. The book will tell inspiring stories of how people struggled with, and how they finally accomplished, a specific mitzvah (commandment) that was particularly difficult for them. (A free book and $180US will be given to the author of each article that is selected for publication.)

Himelfarb's speed, laser shot help Griffins to AHL win

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — A speedy Grand Rapids Griffins' forward blew into town recently and doubtless made an impression on the host Manitoba Moose. In the second game of a two-game set, Toronto native Eric Himelfarb notched the game-winner in a 5-1 victory, earning the visitors a split in the series.

With the Griffins leading 1-0 early in the opening period, Himelfarb picked up a loose puck at the Manitoba blue line in full flight, raced to the top of the right face-off circle and unleashed a laser that Moose netminder Alex Auld never saw.

The diminutive 5-9, 170-pound centre, who was a nominee for AHL rookie of the month for January, displayed a hint of frustration when queried about his physical stature.

"You know, that question has been asked of me my whole life. Going into the Ontario Hockey League [OHL], I went a bit later because of my size. Going into the NHL, draft I went a bit later because of my size [he was the sixth selection by Montreal, 171st overall, in the 2001 NHL Entry Draft]. There's nothing I can do about it. I've just got to show them that I can play, even though I'm one of the smaller guys."

Himelfarb can play all right. He's second in scoring on the Griffins with 14 goals and 17 assists in 53 games. His acceleration is exceptional, he skates like the wind, he's very slick around the net, and he's regularly used on both the power play and penalty killing units.

Former Boston Bruins scout Bob Goring, father of one-time New York Islanders' star forward Butch Goring, agreed that Himelfarb has loads of talent. "Oh you notice him out there all right. He's fast and he's got a lot of skills," Goring said from his perch in the press box.

Himelfarb's coach Danton Cole, a former Winnipeg Jets forward, is effusive when he talks about the 22-year-old rookie. "Eric's pretty slippery and he's got a lot of speed. He'll cut through the middle and try to drive the defence back and go to the net. That's something he's learning to do and he's getting better as a first-year guy. He's very dangerous out there and he's our second-leading scorer right now for a reason."

Now a Detroit Red Wings farmhand, Himelfarb made an impression on Auld a long time ago.

"He's a guy who is always first in on the forecheck, and you definitely notice him. I played against him in junior when I was in North Bay and Eric was in Sarnia. He's a feisty guy who is all over the ice," the Moose goalie said.

Himelfarb feels the NHL lockout has had a positive affect on the AHL.

"It's made our league a much better league," he said. "With all the young guys that were playing in the NHL now in the AHL, it's made it more competitive."

Himelfarb didn't lack for junior hockey experience, having played with Sarnia Sting, the Barrie Colts and Kingston Frontenacs.

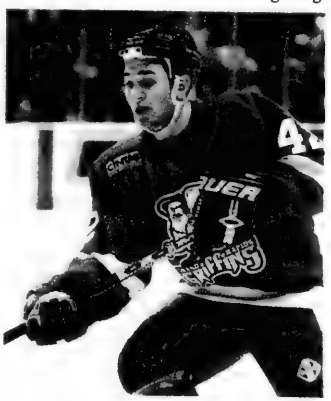
During his five OHL campaigns, including one with the Frontenacs as an over-age player, he led his team in scoring three times, and he finished third on two other occasions. In his final Frontenacs campaign, he had 107 points (37 goals and 70 assists) in 67 games, fourth overall in the league.

More often than not, behind every successful athlete, are supportive parents. Eric considers himself blessed to have had Sam and Anne Himelfarb in his corner for so many winters.

"My parents have been unbelievable," he remarked. "They have been my biggest fans. Even when I got drafted by Sarnia, they'd drive 2½ hours. The other night, they drove 5½ hours each way just to see me play. It speaks volumes about them. It's nice to have them there. It's great to have parents like that."

As for his background, Himelfarb said the family attends synagogue on Yom Kippur and Rosh Hashanah and that he had a bar mitzvah.

Eric is also friends with another Jewish AHLer, Cory Pecker of the Cincinnati Mighty Ducks, whom he hopes will soon snap out of a scoring drought. The slump resulted in Pecker being sent down to the East Coast Hockey League before being recalled. He's scored three goals and eight assists in 45 games.



Eric Himelfarb

Another Jewish AHLer is Adam Henrich, who skates for Springfield (seven goals, 13 assists in 47 games). Adam's older brother, Michael, the Edmonton Oilers' first round selection in the 1998 NHL Entry Draft, is now playing in Europe.

"[Michael is] playing in Austria in some tier two league over there," Himelfarb said. "My mom and his mom are very good friends. Last we heard, he's over there. I heard he's doing really well. I don't think he's given up as a pro. He went over there to gain some confidence putting the puck in the net. That's what he's good at. Hopefully when the lockout ends, he'll come back over here and play."

Like every one else in the AHL, Himelfarb still has high hopes. "That's why we all play the game," he said. "It's to get to the NHL. You've just got to work hard and hope that hard work pays off.

Though he was originally drafter by the Canadiens, Himelfarb isn't disappointed that he's now the property of the Red Wings. He subscribes to the "bashert" philosophy. "I believe everything happens for a reason and you know I think I'm much better off in this type of organization."

Israelis geared up for Davis Cup contest versus Britain

By ORI LEWIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli tennis enjoyed one of its most thrilling weekends in years, when its Davis Cup team hosted Great Britain over three days in the Euro/Africa Zone Group I match that started last Friday.

Israel was represented at the Israel Tennis Center at Ramat Hasharon by singles players Harel Levy and Noam Okun, and the strong doubles pairing of Andy Ram and Yoni Erlich, who won the prestigious Rotterdam doubles title the week before.

Their British opponents were led by Montreal-born Greg Rusedski, who represented Canada earlier in his career and is by far the most accomplished player participating. Arvind Parmar, David Sherwood and Andrew Murray, the 17-year-old U.S. Open junior champion, are also on the team.

Historically in Davis Cup competition, world rankings are no more than a biographical note that assist in categorizing the players, but Israel's captain Oded Yaakov said anything could happen against the strong British team.

"Any result is possible in this tie [match]. Rusedski is by no means assured of his two points and neither is our doubles team, but I believe we are capable of coming away from the weekend with three points, although I cannot say which matches we could win," Yaakov said prior to the first serve.

A rejuvenated Levy, who had a poor year dogged by injury and personal strife, said he felt confident, and announced he would be the first to take on the big-serving Rusedski. Okun, who is recovering from illness, is set to play Britain's No. 2 player, probably Parmar.

"I have a lot to prove especially after the last tie against Finland [last year] when I was in poor form," Levy said. "I have now overcome that poor patch which was not just on court, but in my personal life, and I am now in much better form."

Israel Tennis Association chair Ian Froman said interest by the public was very high, and that a full stadium was expected for the first two days, for the first time in years.

British team captain Jeremy Bates said his team was good enough to win even without world No. 7 Tim Henman, who retired from Davis Cup play before the tie.

"When you lose somebody as good as Tim, it's a disappointment," Bates said. "It was always inevitable that Tim was going to retire and at some stage Greg is, but we have an exciting future. We've got some young players coming through who have done well on the senior tour," he said.

Despite the Tel Aviv night club suicide bombing that killed five people, Bates appeared more concerned about the sporting aspects of the competition.

"It was a terrible thing, a very unfortunate thing, but I think that sport must go on... I think that there are a lot of people involved in this event who have obviously taken great care to make sure the event runs smoothly," he said.

Murray told British reporters the players had been warned "not to do anything stupid."

"Jeremy spoke to us," said Murray. "He told us we must not leave the hotel on our own, even going for a run or shopping at the supermarket."

Our resilient, strong-minded Israeli cousins

By SANDIE BENITAH

I was 12 years old when I first met my cousin Simayda from Israel, and even though there was only a nine-month age gap between us, I still felt like we were worlds apart.

Whereas I was shy and very much a little girl, she was fearless and outspoken, and the truth was, I couldn't keep up. When she went back home, we rarely kept in touch except for the occasional update through our grandmother. As the years went by, I wasn't surprised to hear she was doing well in the army and was happy when I heard she had fallen in love.

About 10 years later, when my grandfather was nearing the end of his life, Simayda came back to Toronto for a visit, but this time she seemed quiet, poised and incredibly mature. Once again, I couldn't keep up with my younger cousin as I just couldn't relate to the quiet confidence that I saw in her eyes.

This past summer, I saw her again, but first in a vision. That exact same look that had intimidated me years before I saw again in the eyes of Yoav, the security guard on the Birthright Israel trip I was on. "Nice gun!" I said to him with a wink, talking about the rifle slung across the front of his chest.

He grinned back and said, "It never fails. Each time I meet a [North] American, there's always a comment about my gun. They're fascinated. Here people start firing guns when they're 18 like it's no big deal."

I got his point, and looking around at my friends and me, I realized just how different we seemed to be from all of our Israeli cousins. On one hand, 20somethings are 20somethings, no matter where in the world we live. We all carry the same baggage.

I realized just how much that was true last week as I looked at the horrifying images of young Israelis on the news, screaming and crying in terror after the suicide blast outside a Tel Aviv club. In the midst of the chaos, I spotted one girl, who appeared to be in her 20s, carrying the same style of purse I had bought just a week earlier.

It hit me hard. There was no denying it. We might carry the same purse, but their baggage is a heck of a lot heavier.

I thought about that cool look in my Israeli friends' eyes and their unmistakable attitude toward life. From the time Simayda was young, she had a zest for life and she never let fear get in her way. On her first trip to Toronto, she was riding the subway when our grandma realized somebody had just picked her pocket. Before we knew what was happening, my little cousin was running up and down the platform with her fists clenched, ready to teach the culprit a lesson.

This past summer, Simayda surprised me again, showing no fear as she and her husband talked strict Birthright officials into letting me spend an afternoon with them. Now I was with her on her turf and suddenly the look in her eyes didn't seem so out of place. She is a reflection of Israeli youth and their passion, their candor, but most of all their strength. I look at their guns and wonder, and often I stand in the shadows of their strength.

Yes, we're lucky to be able to go out dancing on the weekend without a second thought to all the what-ifs. But it seems that in exchange, we've missed out on becoming the type of people we all look up to – certainly the resilient and strong-minded person I'd like to be.

I might never understand the wisdom behind the looks in their eyes, but thankfully we have our Israeli cousins to remind us of what we're missing.

ROASTED CARROTS, PARSNIPS AND LEMMONS

4 lg. carrots peeled, cut diagonally into 1/4" pieces
5 lg. parsnips peeled, cut diagonally into 1/8" pieces
20 garlic cloves, peeled

About Life

Dear Ella,

Thank goodness this is an anonymous column. I'm about to admit something I've only ever said to myself.

I want to marry a lifestyle. I don't really care about the man, as long as he is a decent person. I'm 24 and have been on my share of blind dates with loser after loser. I will do or say whatever it takes to catch the man who can give me my dreams.

I never want to worry about money again. I want round-the-clock nannies, as well as to wake up when I please, to buy what I want and to be the envy of all my friends.

I grew up in a very modest home where my parents always fought about money and paying the bills. I hated it and never want to be there again.

The man I marry must be able to keep me in a lifestyle that will give me the happiness I rarely saw at home.

I'm really just writing to vent and hear your opinion about what I'm saying.

Need to Marry Money

Dear Need to Marry Money,

I'm not sure where you came up with the idea that money is all you need to be happy, but I can assure you it's wrong.

Sure, financial security helps. It can give you freedom to pick and choose what you would like to do. But you can't buy friends or love, at least not real ones. You can surround yourself with "yes people" who will do and say what you want, but it will be because you're paying them.

Your emotional needs will not be met. It could be a very lonely life you've chosen for yourself, and that's if you can even pull it off.

One way you can have your cake and eat it too is to give yourself the lifestyle you want without a spouse and reap great personal rewards in the process. Then you would have to give up nothing. Of course, we are talking about hard work, education, imagination and maybe some luck, but just imagine the rewards, self-gratification and freedom to achieve the life you're dreaming of all on your own.

Money makes things easier, but with a loveless marriage, you would be missing so much of what makes life rich.

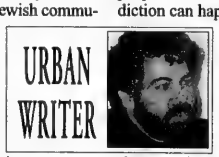
Jews, cocaine and courage

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG



I have never received as many responses to a column as I have from my recent one titled "David Rosenzweig: The no-trial trial," which discussed the high rates of dependency on hard drugs and alcohol in Toronto's Jewish community.

Generally, readers agreed that the problem is enormous and requires a concerted effort by our leadership to understand and stymie the use of heroin, cocaine and other hard drugs, as well as excess alcohol consumption.

The problem is indeed serious and complex. According to Rabbi Abraham J. Twerski, M.D., a renowned authority and a leading innovator in chemical dependency treatment, the belief among Jews has been that "Shikker as a goy" – that is, a drunk is not Jewish – and the same applies to the widespread denial of drug abuse.

Rabbi Twerski said that "for years, no matter who you talked to – rabbis, anybody – it was 'No, there's no problem.'" In an interview with the Chicago Jewish News, he said our main objective needs to be to break down the denial so people are aware that "alcoholism and drug addiction can happen in the finest of families. It can and it does."

In the same article, Marcy Cohn, the chemical dependency specialist for one of Rabbi Twerski's programs, agreed that denial in our community is rampant, and it's connected to shame and guilt and feelings of isolation. She added that many people see this as a moral issue instead of understanding it as a health issue.

Cohn said the reason for denial might be that we are a close-knit community. People are secretive and don't want to be stigmatized or found out. She added that the Orthodox community has additional reasons for being in denial, because families investigate other families when attempting to match up their children, and "any suspicion of an alcohol or drug problem can make a family 'blacklisted' in terms of the marriageability of its sons or daughters."

Zalman Goldberg, a professional with JACS Toronto (Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others) recently spoke at a fundraiser for the organization. In his speech, he said: "Two years ago the city of Toronto was hit with a terrible tragedy. An upstanding member of the community was brutally taken from us in his prime…no matter what we tell ourselves… no matter what we wish to believe, he was murdered by a drug-addicted youth who was at Lawrence and Bathurst looking to buy drugs from our kids."

Zalman added, "My friend Gord Hayward tells parents in crisis he only wishes he had had the opportunity to know what his son and his friends were up to. He unfortunately found out too little, too late." (In May 1988, Hayward's son, Benji, 14, drowned in Lake Ontario. His body was found three days after he disappeared following a Pink Floyd concert where he took two hits of LSD.)

The crisis is so colossal that since JACS set up its 410 help (416-410-JACS) line four years ago, it has received more than 6,000 calls from people who either suffered from, or knew someone who suffered from, the disease of addiction.

Furthermore, the Orthodox Union recently published a call to action regarding alcoholism stemming from kiddush clubs in shuls.

Zalman ended his speech by saying, "We face a crisis [in our community.] It's called addiction. It's about a father, a mother, a son, a daughter. About family. Our family. Our community… and we commit to providing the best resources out there for youth at risk; to educate teens, their families, their teachers and community leaders about not only the dangers they face, but about the answers, the help and the hope that exists so that the suffering will stop. Make JACS a household name for the sake of the children."

"Addiction doesn't discriminate."

Passport flap political, envoy says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canada's decision to remove the placeline Israel from Canadian passports listing Jerusalem as the bearer's birthplace is driven by political rather than administrative considerations, charges Israel's ambassador to Canada.

In an interview on March 14, Alan Baker said he was told by the Department of Foreign Affairs that the decision has no political connotations and should be regarded as purely "an administrative action."

Asked whether he accepts this explanation, Baker replied, "Clearly, it's political, because Canada doesn't recognize Israel's sovereignty over [any part of] Jerusalem. It's a political position."

Baker was initially surprised by Canada's decision. "I couldn't understand it."

In a reference to Israel's informal ceasefire with the Palestinians, which went into effect on Feb. 8 following a meeting between Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Baker added: "I fear it [Canada's decision] won't help the present atmosphere in the [Middle East], where things are moving forward."

Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker

About 100 Canadian passports listing the bearer's birthplace as "Jerusalem, Israel" have been issued, according to Baker.

He said he has no idea how many have been returned.

Baker asked the Canadian government not to recall the passports, but officials simply told him they would look into the matter.

Dan Kingsbury, a spokesperson for Passport Canada, said he does not know when the order was issued to recall the passports, nor does he know how many are in circulation.

"It was an administrative error, and administrative errors can happen," he said. "We're moving to correct it. We'll replace passports free of charge."

Passport holders will be contacted if they do not turn in their passports, he said.

Asked whether Canada would also recall passports listing the bearer's birthplace as "Tel Aviv, Israel," Kingsbury would not comment.

"Canada has said the issue of Jerusalem can only be resolved as part of a general [peace] settlement," he noted.

Vast majority of Israeli Jews won't give up Western Wall for peace

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Some 91 per cent of the Jewish public in Israel are unwilling to give up Israeli control of the Western Wall in exchange for peace, according to results of a poll published last week.

A representative sample of the Jewish population was polled on whether, in exchange for a final real peace agreement, Israel should transfer a number of sacred sites to the Palestinians, be prepared for joint control, or keep the sites under sole Israeli control.

None of those polled said they would agree to Palestinian control over the Western Wall, although six per cent were willing to see joint control.

PA control rejected

With regard to the Temple Mount, 46 per cent would agree to joint Israeli-Palestinian control, or sole Palestinian control, according to the survey conducted by the Dahaf Institute. Nine per cent of the public favoured transferring control to the Palestinians, 36 per cent favoured joint control, 51 per cent favoured Israeli control only.

Asked about the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron, 13 per cent were in favour of giving control to the Palestinians, 33 per cent for joint control and 49 per cent for sole Israeli control.

Thirteen per cent of those questioned said they would agree for the Tomb of Rachel in Bethlehem to be in Palestinian hands, 30 per cent would opt for joint control and 53 per cent wanted to see Israeli control only.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Israeli Gays Marry

TORONTO — Tel Aviv's first openly gay city councillor Etai Pinkas, 31, and his boyfriend Yoav Arad, along with three other Israeli gay couples, were in Canada last week to get married in Ontario, where same-sex marriages are legal. The couples were to wed at Toronto City Hall last Friday. Pinkas said he's determined to make Israel aware of how gays are discriminated against, and he said he intends to take the matter to the Israeli Supreme Court if authorities there don't recognize his marriage. Last September, Uzi Even, the first openly gay man elected to the Knesset, also wed in Toronto.

First Female Rabbi

VANCOUVER — Or Shalom, a progressive "Jewish Renewal" shul in East Vancouver, held a "Kabalat Harav" ceremony last Saturday night for its new spiritual leader and Vancouver's first female pulpit rabbi, Laura Duhan Kaplan. Prior to receiving smichah in January from the Aleph Alliance for Jewish Renewal, Rabbi Kaplan, a New York native, spent 15 years as a philosophy professor at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte.

WORLD

'Red Ken' Honoured

LONDON — London Mayor Ken Livingstone was elected the first-ever honorary president of the student union at the University of London's School of African and Oriental Studies. The group called Livingstone "a champion of liberation campaigns" and the victim of "an unfair and totally biased media campaign aimed at discrediting his attempts at encouraging unity and diversity in London." The mayor has refused to apologize for recently accusing a Jewish journalist of being like "a concentration camp guard." He later called Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon a war criminal

Professor Suspended

PARIS — A French university suspended a professor earlier this month for statements questioning the Holocaust. The University of Lyon-III said it is suspending Bruno Gollnisch, a professor of law and Japanese civilization, for five years for telling reporters last October that the actual number of deaths in Nazi gas chambers "remains for historians to determine." Gollnisch is second in command of the extremist National Front, the party headed by Jean-Marie Le Pen.

U.S. Jewish Leader Eulogized

DETROIT — More than 1,250 people attended the March 6 funeral of Max Fisher, the elder statesman of the U.S. Jewish community who died in his suburban Detroit home March 3 at age 96.

The dean of Jewish Republicans, Fisher advised every Republican president since Eisenhower, according to the Republican Jewish Coalition, which he founded and in which he served as chairman emeritus.

Among the many dignitaries at his funeral were 30 Israeli officials, including Sallai Meridor, chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI). Prime Minister Ariel Sharon also eulogized Fisher. "The State of Israel has lost a true friend, who was one of its greatest supporters," he told his cabinet.

Fisher led many Jewish groups, including United Jewish Appeal, the Council of Jewish Federations, United Israel Appeal and B'nai B'rith International. He was also founding chairman of JAFI's board of governors.

Fisher, who made his wealth in oil and real estate and was the oldest member of the Forbes 400, was instrumental in the airlift of U.S. arms to Israel in the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Swastika in the Snow

BERLIN — Planes arriving at Berlin's Tegel airport last Monday were greeted by an 8-by-5 metre swastika scraped out of snow on a frozen lake a few kilometres from the runway. A pilot who noticed it when landing informed the airport control tower After testing the ice thickness, water police erased the Nazi symbol, which is banned in Germany.

More Compensation

NEW YORK — Jewish victims of Nazi medical experiments will receive a second compensation payment. The Claims Conference said 2,432 Jewish victims will receive approximately $3,200 (US) each. Victims received a $5,400 payment last year.

Heirs Win Redress

BERLIN — Heirs to a Berlin department store seized from its Jewish owners by the Nazis in the 1930s are entitled to $17 million (US) in compensation, a German court has ruled. Barbara Principe and her nephew, heirs to the Wertheim department store, will receive money from the sale of property that was once part of the family's holdings. The property was bought by a private firm, Karstadt-Quelle, after the fall of communism in 1994. The company said it would appeal. Cases involving other properties once owned by the family are still in the courts.

Congress urges Canadian action on Darfur

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress is calling on the government of Canada to follow up its earlier pledges to help protect the residents of Darfur, Sudan from an "unfolding tragedy" that has already claimed 300,000 lives.

In a letter to Prime Minister Paul Martin, Congress urged the prime minister to make good on the "responsibility to protect" guidelines – which would give the international community the right to intervene in Sudan to prevent gross violation of human rights – that Martin has previously advocated.

"We trust that all necessary further steps will be implemented forthwith to ensure a successful Canadian foreign policy as it relates to Darfur. We also know from our advocacy work that many Canadians await with great anticipation the speedy enactment of an effective strategy, which will help protect the millions of innocents whose lives are at risk, while simultaneously bringing credit to us as a nation impelled by conscience," states the letter from Mark Weintraub, chair of Congress' national Darfur committee.

Following the NATO summit in Brussels recently, Martin said Canada was prepared to take part in an international force in Sudan. "We are prepared to do whatever is required, but we cannot simply sit by and watch what is happening in Darfur continue," he said at the time.

Martin discussed the Darfur situation with British Prime Minister Tony Blair and hinted that Canada would support United Nations efforts to establish a UN peacekeeping force in the Sudanese territory.

Weintraub, however, said the UN route appears to be stalled.

Letter sent to Prime Minister Paul Martin

"Notwithstanding the efforts of Canadian and others, the [UN] Security Council seems no closer to taking effective action to provide protection to the people so tragically affected," his letter stated.

In a telephone interview from Vancouver, Weintraub suggested Russia, China and Algeria were blocking a proposed UN peacekeeping force. While Canada can't overcome these roadblocks alone, it can shine a spotlight on these countries for obstructing action on Darfur, he said.

The international community must do something to prevent genocide in Darfur, whether under UN auspices or as part of a NATO operation, he continued.

"We don't have the final answer here. We have skilled people in Ottawa and we need to have the political will to say, we are going to find a political solution here. This has got to be doable."

The Jewish community in particular must lend its support to Canadian efforts to end the Darfur genocide, he continued.

The phrase "never again" must apply to all people, and Jews and Canadians face an "ethical imperative" to speak out against mass murder. "We don't want to add Darfur to the list of genocides in five years and be watching Hotel Darfur (a reference to Hotel Rwanda, a film about the 1994 murder of Tutsis in that African state) in five years," he said.

"For our own internal credibility, we have an ethical imperative here," he said.

Congress has been urging the government for at least a year to take a leading role to end the crisis in Darfur. It is also calling on the Jewish community to lobby their MPs and other decision-makers on the issue.

Congress is sponsoring a national Purim petition that will be delivered to the government and it is working with rabbis to formulate a Passover program that might be included at seders to highlight the crisis in Darfur.

"The greatest response we've received is from the Holocaust survivor community, as this community wants to know their suffering was not in vain," Weintraub added.

Darkness can bring light

From the editor's desk

Bryna Wasserman radiates self-searching honesty. This is quickly apparent early in conversation with the engaging, soft-spoken author of The Naked Island.

Indeed, self-searching is the creative thread that courses through every page and chapter of The Naked Island. It is an unconventional, darkly imaginative tale of one woman's unsettling confrontation with a malevolent, ancient, evil spirit, even as she confronts her own emotional demons to rescue love from the metaphysical mystery and danger arrayed against her.

One reviewer has described The Naked Island as "a haunting story of love and betrayal." Another wrote that it is a "a delicious gothic travelogue – one woman's journey through a tortured dreamscape of love, possession and ecstatic release."

The narrow story line of The Naked Island is relatively straightforward: A young Jewish woman from a small town in Ontario leaves her home for places far more exotic – Israel, Australia, India, Nepal and Singapore. She meets and falls in love with someone who is part of that exotic world and completely outside the religious and cultural frame of reference of her Ontario home. The gravity of the couple's love forms the passionate centre of the story. But cutting into that centre time and again are an interfering evil spirit and a knife's edge of other emotional and psychological issues that plague our wandering protagonist.

At times, the book is as much poetry as prose, beautifully crafted, carefully pieced together. But it is not easy reading.

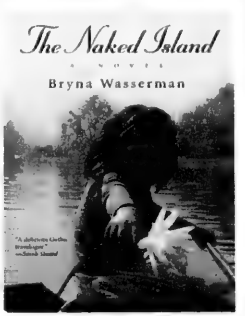
Readers should not expect imagery of a golden-meadow, sun-shiny, hilltop romp of romantic self-discovery. Dark spirits inhabit the story, lurking at the corners of the many critical moments of the story's central relationship, that of Rachel, the protagonist, and Kifli, her lover. The relationship itself is personal, passionate and intimate. Wasserman relies on her considerable skills to convey its full startling depth.

After I read the novel, I wanted to meet the author to better understand the energy, experiences and imagination from which the novel was born.

We met recently at a mid-town Toronto coffee shop, where we talked at length about the hard thought and labour that writing a novel entails.

Wasserman began the book about 10 years ago. "The writing process was a joy and a torture. The book did not simply write itself. It was hard work, but somewhere in the middle I found my groove," she told The CJN. "I'd sit down in the morning and write."

Wasserman has a broad, captivating smile, which, when combined with the occasional tilt of her head, suggests a subtle self-consciousness – perhaps that of a first-time novelist – that belies the novel's open, raw emotion and the courage that I imagine was required to write it. But I do not confuse self-consciousness with self-doubt. For Wasserman is assured and relaxed in the opinions she expresses.



She grew up in Hamilton, the middle of three siblings. University took her to Toronto, where she studied business at Ryerson and English literature at York University. But most of her "education," I surmise, occurred outside the classroom through various positions in land development, fundraising, a stint in the boxing ring and a great deal of travelling.

Indeed, her extensive travelling has been the true-life notebooks for Wasserman's writing. She still spoke about the impact of doing good for others that was impressed into her soul when she lived in Israel during the the summer of 1983 and witnessed first-hand the first airlift and rescue of Ethiopian Jews.

"Rachel represents the generation after the Holocaust," Wasserman said. "She really has that question in her soul, namely, how do we deal with evil. I looked at the problem of dealing with our own dark sides. Sometimes darkness brings light," Wasserman asserts in obvious reference to the novel's ultimate resolution.

Wasserman is a deft painter of visual images and emotional insight For example, the following is an excerpt from the conversation between Rachel and her grandmother on the eve of Rachel's departure.

"'I have to see what's out there, Nana. Uncle Joseph said so. He said if I want to know who I am, I have to be in the world. I need to learn about what's inside of me. I can't just stay here. I have a round-the-world ticket. Look at all these places, Nana. I wish you could come. I'll send your love to Uncle Joseph.' Rachel held her grandmother's narrow chin in her hands. She kissed Nana's eyelids, knowing she had memorized the ancestral eyes underneath. And the smell of her grandmother's still perfectly soft, petal skin had permanently pressed into Rachel, long before she ever knew Nana wouldn't be there forever."

Wasserman poignantly captures a scene that all parents eventually experience with their children. When we read it, we sigh.

(An occasional series to introduce readers to Canadians who strive high.)

Russian community organization celebrates 21st anniversary

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Jewish Russian Community Centre of Toronto (JRCC) will celebrate its 21st anniversary on April 3 with a gala concert at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts.

As many as 1,800 people are expected at the event, which will feature a men's choir from Russia led by Mikhael Turetsky, as well as a silent auction, a reception for major donors and awards presentations to four honorees.

The gala is an important part of the community's annual calendar, said Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, senior rabbi and founder of the JRCC. About half of the centre's $3.7 million budget will be raised at the gala and the fundraising that precedes it. The rest of the JRCC's budget is derived from tickets, tuition and other program revenues, he said.

In the past few years, the JRCC has expanded to meet increasing demand for services from the GTA's estimated 8,000 Russian Jewish families. Last year's gala was held at the same venue, but in its 1,000-seat recital hall. This year, the community requires the extra space of the main stage, Rabbi Zaltzman said.

"We're serving more and more people and we're becoming older," he continued. "We improved the services to the community and more people are getting involved."

Rabbi Zaltzman estimated that about half the Russian Jews in the GTA participate in community programs.

The JRCC was established to maintain Jewish identity, continuity and integration among Jews from the former Soviet Union (FSU), he said.

Since its inception, the JRCC has established an education network that serves 300 youngsters from pre-school to Grade 9 and includes evening and weekend supplementary programs as well as adult education and day care.

Religious services are widely available and community celebrations that attract more than 1,000 people mark such holidays as Purim, Passover and Simchat Torah, Rabbi Zaltzman said. The community publishes both Russian-language and English magazines.

Rabbi Zaltzman said the JRCC has developed a high profile among Jews from the FSU. "I think we are moving slowly forward... In general, the understanding of the importance of Jewish education is growing, but there's a long way for it to grow."

Many Russian-born parents find it hard to meet the tuition requirements of Jewish day schools and choose to send their children to public schools instead, the rabbi said. Some who can afford it are opting to send their children to secular private schools, and "we must compete with that," he added.

Still, the JRCC believes the best way to ensure Jewish continuity, instill Jewish values and develop pride in one's heritage is through Jewish education, he said.

Recent arrivals from the FSU are generally not as connected to their Jewish past as those who emigrated in the 1970s, but they would still like to combine their secular lifestyles with some exposure to Jewish programs, he said.

Some of the younger arrivals feel closer to other gentile Russian immigrants than they do to the established Jewish community in Toronto, because they share the same language, culture, background and history, Rabbi Zaltzman said.

"So, there's still a lot of work to introduce the Russian Jewish community and make them part of the larger Jewish community."

Looking back on the JRCC's 21-year history, Rabbi Zaltzman said the organization's main success has been in its wide range of services for those who wish to connect with their Jewish roots.

Russians who have seen other communities in New York, Los Angeles, Philadelphia and other large centres "say, 'You know rabbi, we didn't know how good we have it,'" he said.

Concert commemorates 60th anniversary of liberation of Auschwitz camp

The Cantor Joseph Cooper Memorial concert, to be held in the main sanctuary of Beth Tzedec Congregation on April 6, at 7:30 p.m., will commemorate the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz and the concentration camps.

Cooper was chazzan of Beth Tzedec from 1955 to 1980, and served as cantor emeritus until his death last year. He was a Holocaust survivor himself and the concert would have also commemorated the 60th anniversary of his liberation.

In a media release, concert chair Shep Gangbar said there has been a large response, and he expects a capacity audience. "All of us have, in one way or another, enjoyed the benefits that those liberated have brought to our community, financially, culturally and spiritually, and feel that this is the least that we can do to express our appreciation."

The evening features a symphony written by the synagogue's cantor Meir Finkelstein for the concert. Cantor Gideon Zelermyer, of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal, will be guest soloist.

Also performing will be the 60-voice Mendelssohn Chorus, along with 60 musicians from the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, the Toronto Philharmonic and the Toronto Opera Company orchestra, conducted by Kerry Stratton. The Beth Tzedec Youth Choir also takes part.

Narrators will be Senator Jerry Grafstein, Judge Jack Grossman, Judge Kathy Feldman, Judge Marvin Catzman and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec.

Prices are $150 for select seating, $75 for preferred seating, and $36 for general admission.

Nefesh B'Nefesh smooths path to aliyah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Three years ago, if anyone had asked olah Tova Serkin whether she could see herself moving to Israel, her answer would have been a resounding "No."

Recently, however, the New York City native spoke to a small group at Beth Tzedec Congregation about why she changed her mind.

Serkin, a Harvard University graduate, was here recently on behalf of Nefesh B'Nefesh, an organization that provides olim with financial assistance, employment resources, social services and guidance through governmental absorption.

In just over three years, it has brought almost 4,000 new immigrants from North America to Israel, including about 90 from Toronto.

Tova Serkin

The organization recently brought over a number of "aliyah ambassadors" to speak to local communities about their new lives and experiences, and to provide a personal perspective on life in Israel as North American olim.

Serkin said that growing up in Brooklyn, she lived in a home that was "committed Jewishly," and Israel was part of that commitment.

"I did not feel a deep emotional connection to Israel, though. Aliyah was not on the radar screen."

When she was a junior at Harvard, however, the intifadah started and she began to consciously think about what Israel meant to her. "Suddenly I had to defend [the country] on campus, and it was something I didn't really understand."

After deciding that she should go to Israel and see first-hand what she was talking about, she spent a year volunteering through Project OTZMA, a program for recent university graduates.

"This was the first time I saw Israel as an insider. I lived in an apartment and I took part in daily, everyday life. I also worked at places where no English was spoken, so I experienced the cultural gap. I had learned Hebrew at day school, but I really picked it up then.

"Something happened that year. I fell in love with the country in a deep way, and I refell in love with being Jewish. In New York, I had lived a [personal] Jewish life, but in Israel I felt it as a national identity. It gave me a real appreciation for the richness of Jewish heritage and culture.

"I began to understand that being an Israeli tourist was just a flirtation. I was seeing all sides of the coin."

When her year with Project OTZMA was up, she said, she went back to New York and gave herself three months to decide what to do.

"I knew that it was right for me to go back. Israel is the future of the Jewish people, and there is so much work to be done there. I felt a sense of obligation. I had a gut feeling that it was the place for me."

Living in Israel is both so much better and so much worse than living in North America, Serkin said. "Issues of terrorism are there, but the highs in terms of living a Jewish life [are indescribable]."

The practical aspects of moving to Israel can be daunting, she conceded, "but I had the privilege of making aliyah through Nefesh B'Nefesh. They have been a tremendous support for me and they streamlined the process," said Serkin, who now lives in Jerusalem with two roommates and does freelance consulting work.

Their ambivalence, our alarm

Prof. Steven Cohen of Hebrew University recently published his very worrisome conclusions about a study on the attitudes of American Jewry to the State of Israel. "In the distant past," Cohen said, "the Israelis were viewed as heroes; in the recent past as victims. Today they are neither heroes nor victims. Israel is increasingly viewed as boring and irrelevant to American Jewry."

The study was funded by the Jewish Agency for Israel, and asked the very same questions in December 2004 as were asked of a group of 1,448 Americans two years earlier.

"The attachment of American Jews to Israel has weakened measurably in the last two years," Cohen concluded.

According to the study, "about 26 per cent of American Jews were very emotionally attached to Israel in 2004, compared with 31 per cent in 2002. When asked how much being Jewish has to do with caring about Israel, 48 per cent said a lot in 2004, compared with 58 per cent in the earlier survey."

The poll's results appear to be confounding experts, most of whom attribute the decline to the Palestinians' war of terror against Israel that began in 2000. But the experts find opposite meaning in the intifadah.

Some researchers, such as Prof. Shulamit Reinharz of Brandeis University, suggest that the conflict with the Palestinians has "damaged the image of Israel among American Jews and led many to distance themselves from the Jewish state."

Cohen himself, however, disagrees with this view. He attributes the decline to the relative calming of the violence directed at Israel at the time the study was conducted last December. But irrespective of the precise causative factors for the 2004 findings, Cohen did observe that the results, alas, were part of a downward spiral in the collective Jewish identity of American Jews, including attachment to Israel, over the past 40 years.

Cohen's findings are disturbing, especially so because, as study after study has shown, the link to Israel is weaker among the upcoming, younger generation than it is among their parents and grandparents. One's link to Israel, we know, is also an indicator of one's link to his or her Jewish identity.

American community leaders, decision makers, educators and parents must calmly but comprehensively try to understand the full import of the study's findings. For example, how do they correlate to the Birthright Israel program, which has been widely viewed as a success? What, indeed, is becoming of American Jewry? Are there any lessons in Cohen's findings for the Jews of Canada?

The apparently increasing ambivalence among American Jews towards Israel is cause for profound alarm. But now that the alarm has been sounded, we must react.

Sharon's disengagement policy

Rabbi Marvin B. Pachino's article ("Just who is putting all of Israel at risk?" CJN, Feb. 24) is one of the best pieces on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement policy. It is honest, unemotional, unpoliticized, factual and questioning.

Sharon, with the collusion of the media in their demonizing and delegitimizing of his opposition, will come back to haunt him.

I know dozens of maligned, hard-working, patriotic families who are the present-day chalutzim (pioneers). Why are they portrayed as extremists – fanatic perpetrators who are risking Israel's future for their own selfish means? Why has the liberal media, first to call foul play, not been heard from?

The world might respect honest debate in the form of a referendum rather than Sharon's autocratic power-plays.

I pray that his peace-seeking efforts in appeasing the Palestinian Authority, the Arabs and the West, at the cost of Israel, meet with success, but I have strong doubts that they will.

Sharon compromising for peace

Rabbi Marvin B. Pachino claims that the minority he is speaking for is being treated harshly and unfairly, especially by the Israeli government and "the complicit media."

He is on the wrong side of history. More Israelis and Jews in the Diaspora have come to realize that it is the settler ideology that is most likely to jeopardize the future of the Jewish state.

Rabbi Pachino sees Sharon and Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres as "indifferent to the lessons of the last dozen years." I see two statesmen who have learned that peace is only possible through compromise.

He concludes that "a serious threat comes from those who will not learn from history and would divide this nation [Israel] into 'them' and 'us' by the tyranny of the elites – or those who fancy themselves to be the elites."

I agree that is it unwise to allow "the elites" to divide the nation. But I have in mind a different group who refuse to learn from history and who fancy themselves to be the elites.

Dissent and government legitimacy

Your editorial endorsement ("Legitimate debate," March 10) of the Globe and Mail column by Shira Herzog, like Herzog's column itself, went overboard in seeking to suppress debate on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan.

Freedom to dissent is inherent in the nature of a democracy, including the right to dissent as to the legitimacy –as opposed to the merits – of a government enactment.

Your editorial and Herzog's column confuse two separate issues – the substance of the protesters' message and the nature of their protest. The editorial refers to some of the methods used by some of Sharon's opponents. Many critics of disengagement have objected to these methods, too.

On the other hand, no criticism of the government or even of the system of government should be off limits. Our own democracy frequently deals with issues of governmental legitimacy. Political finance, judicial "lawmaking," election "gag laws," the alleged flaws of the constituency electoral system and the sponsorship scandal – all of these go not to the question of the merits of a government decision, but to fundamental questions of how governments are chosen and how they govern.

These questions are not new to Israel, either. What is new is that those who were silent when the dissent came from the left – including the call for mass disobedience by soldiers – are calling for a stern response when the dissent is from the right.

Those of us who are committed to Israel's democracy should call on all sides, especially the government, whose responsibility is the highest, to show respect for the democratic expectations of all concerned.

There will never be a resolution that satisfies everyone. The value of democracy is that it confers legitimacy on decisions we don't like. When we are imprecise in condemning dissent, we do not sustain that legitimacy, we undermine it.

Funding Jewish education

In the article "'Crusading spirit' needed for Jewish education," (CJN, Feb. 24), I was quoted incorrectly. The article said that I "suggested that parents could be charged tuition for a maximum of two children, instead of for all their children, if they have more than two children at a time in the system" and "also that tuition could be reduced."

I actually suggested the opposite: we should not cut the tuition. Cutting the tuition would mean that those who can afford it will not be paying the full amount, thus reducing community resources to be spent on subsidizing those who cannot afford it. Until about 30 years ago, the system of subsidizing all tuitions by grants to schools was in effect, but because it did not target the needy students, but rather all students of a school, it proved to be wasteful of resources.

Purim meets Good Friday

By RABBI JOSHUA HAMMERMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

This year, for the first time since 1910, Purim will coincide with Good Friday. While it is tempting to toss it aside as a calendrical quirk, this collision of holy days yields fascinating shadings in the meaning of each.

The Christian Holy Week is supposed to coincide with Passover, with Easter occurring on the Sunday after the first full moon following the vernal equinox. But during Jewish leap years, Passover is occasionally pushed more than a month beyond that, leaving Easter and Good Friday to contend with Passover's little sister, that mischievous demi-festival, that masked "Mardi-Gras," Purim.

Purim is in many ways the anti-Passover. One is noted for its levity while the other is totally unleavened. On Purim, Jews let loose, freeing themselves from restrictions and imbibing until all boundaries are dissolved, even those distinguishing good from evil. On Passover, the key to liberation is through tightening those restrictions, exchanging Purim's anarchy for a severity of structure so complete that its main meal is even called the seder, which means "order."

For American Jews and Christians, it's natural for Passover and Holy Week to coincide.

That way, the networks can show The Ten Commandments and we can have lots of interfaith discussions on the seasonal symbolism of the egg and whether Manischewitz was served at the Last Supper. As far as we know, none of the apostles was asked to pass the hamantaschen.

But this year, although the markets are already stocked with matzot, that prankster Purim is showing up instead. So while our Christian neighbours will be commemorating the crucifixion, we'll be contemplating the passion of the prune.

And rather than dwelling on those eternal questions of collective guilt, this year, Jews will proudly proclaim, on Good Friday, "We did it! Yep. We hanged him" – speaking of Haman, of course, not about Jesus.

Although Purim and Good Friday so rarely coincide (strangely, it will happen again in three years, then not until 2113), I am not the first to make the connection between the deaths of Haman and Jesus.

The ancient Aramaic translations of the book of Esther in fact use the word tzalab, meaning "crucify," in describing Haman's fate, a view echoed by the first-century historian Josephus, and there is some doubt as to whether hanging using a noose was even known in ancient times.

During the fifth century, Byzantine emperors forbade the Jewish practice of burning an effigy of Haman on Purim, suspecting that they were doing it as a parody of Jesus' death.

In the Sistine Chapel, Michelangelo also depicts Haman's death in Christological terms.

And there are strong parallels between how both the Passion Play and, on a much smaller scale, the Purim story have incited mob violence and hatred toward each other.

A year ago, many Jews feared that Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ would unleash a torrent of anti-Semitism. What ensued was a flood of free publicity, but very little else.

As I left the theatre after seeing the film, bristling at the stereotypes perpetuated by Gibson, I looked around at the tear-filled eyes of those sitting around me and realized that they had been watching a completely different movie.

I can imagine that the inverse would be true if Steven Spielberg were to tackle the Purim story. Non-Jews would dislike the Jews' gleeful butchering of their Persian hosts, while I would be cheering the last-second salvation of a buzzer-beating God, reassured by the "happily-ever-after" ending too often denied Jews in the real world.

Hitler reportedly banned the celebration of Purim in Poland in 1941 because he understood the power of this story. He sensed that the hanging of Haman could galvanize the faith of Jews in the same way that the crucifixion ignites the passion of Christians.

It is telling that when Christians hear their story, they cry in silence. When Jews hear the Megillah, we laugh and make lots of noise.

We might surmise that if, as Carol Burnett said, "Comedy is tragedy plus time," then "Purim is the Passion plus a good punch line." Come to think of it, a risen Messiah is a pretty good punch line too.

In any faith, God always gets the last laugh.

According to the book of Esther, "These days of Purim will never cease among the Jews." From this, the midrash deduces that when the Messiah comes, Purim is the only holiday that will continue to be celebrated.

Perhaps this year on Purim we will become more conscious of the tears being shed around us, while, at the same time, understand that the laughter ultimately will prevail, for all peoples, on that sunny spring day when hatred dissolves into love and Haman and Mordechai become one.

That will be a very Good Friday indeed.

Seniors enjoy the holiday, too

By JANE ULMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Offering the chance to parade in costume as Queen Esther or King Achashverosh, shake graggers at the mention of Haman's name and feast on hamantaschen, Purim is the perfect holiday – for our kids' grandparents and great-grandparents.

At every age, we must be connected to life's fun side, and Purim, the boisterous and tumultuous holiday that begins this year at sundown on March 24 and celebrates the triumph of the Jews in ancient Persia over enemies determined to destroy them, gives us that opportunity.

But far more than the kids, today's elders – many of whom are dealing with the death of a spouse, poor health, loneliness and/or dwindling finances – need the frivolity that Purim brings. Of the 35 million Americans who are 65 and over, up to seven million suffer from some form of depression, according to the National Institute of Mental Health. That age group also has the nation's highest suicide rate, according to the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control.

"Laughter is the best medicine," says Faye Sharabi, activity director for Jewish Family Service of Los Angeles' Valley Storefront, an adult day health-care centre in North Hollywood, Calif. For the entire month leading up to Purim, Sharabi provides fun-filled activities as part of the Storefront's five-day-a-week program for the physically disabled and/or memory-impaired clients, who range in age from 40 to 99.

"The Megillah is a fascinating story that is not just for kids," says Sharabi, who stresses Queen Esther's positive outlook and ability to inspire the Jewish people. She arranges a Queen Esther "makeover" for the female participants as well as a beauty pageant, with everyone designated a queen. "When you're elderly, you're still beautiful," she says.

The highlight, however, is Purim morning, when the king and queen, selected by lottery beforehand, are crowned and feted with flowers, a fiddler playing Jewish songs and a parade.

In addition, costumed second-graders from nearby Adat Ari El Day School come to sing, dance and share hamantaschen that they baked the previous day. They also bring sequins, feathers and other art materials to make Mardi Gras-style masks.

"The older people love the kids. They see that the kids care about them and that they are not left alone," says Grade 2 teacher Soli Friedman.

For many, Purim evokes positive memories of their own childhood celebrations.

"I played Queen Esther at the Rock Park Theater in Rockaway Park. My mother made me a long white dress with a red sash. My brother was Haman," says Ida Greenbaum, who was originally from New York and now lives in the Los Angeles Jewish Home for the Aging in Reseda, Calif.

Another resident, Anne Marion, who grew up in Chicago, remembers her mother buying cherries and prunes off of a horse-drawn cart. "We didn't have a grinder. We used a chopping knife with a single blade and a big wooden bowl," she says.

Others were denied such memories.

"My father was an atheist. There was no religion in the home," says Dorothy DelMonte, who lives in the Jewish home.

Molly Forrest, the home's chief executive officer, says, "They enjoy and share memories with other Jews here. For some of them, it's a part of their heritage that they discover anew."

With two campuses and two full-time rabbis, the home offers its 800 residents many opportunities to revisit or rediscover their Jewish heritage.

For Purim, there's a full Megillah reading, in Hebrew and English, on both campuses. In addition, Grade 7 students from the Abraham Joshua Heschel Day School in Northridge, Calif., entertain the residents with songs and skits, and then visit with them over hamantaschen.

"These intergenerational interactions give students and seniors an opportunity to appreciate each other's unique outlooks and experiences," says Betty Winn, Heschel's head of school.

But some older adults are not very interested in intergenerational activities. "We have too much fun ourselves," says Paula Fern, director of the Jewish Family Service of Los Angeles' Pico-Robertson Storefront and Holocaust Survivors Program.

Her group is Café Europa, a social and support group for Holocaust survivors founded in 1987 by social worker Flo Kinsler that has spread to other U.S. cities.

In Los Angeles, Café Europa's Purim celebration, funded by the Claims Conference, is expected to draw some 150 survivors. Fern says the March 22 event is a a catered luncheon with singing in several languages, dancing and feasting. Many of the members, who observe a range of religious practices, attend Megillah readings and carnivals with their families.

For some survivors, the festivities provide an opportunity to recall memories of a happy Jewish childhood in prewar Europe.

Eva David, who grew up in Transylvania, remembers her mother covering every available surface of their house with freshly baked cakes. "Mother would put each cake in a cloth napkin, and we would take them to the neighbours… The whole street was filled with Jewish children carrying cakes," she says.

But other survivors remember being rounded up into ghettoes or concentration camps, or hiding, fleeing or living under false identities when they should have been celebrating Jewish holidays.

John Gordon was born in Budapest. Now president of Los Angeles branch of Child Survivors of the Holocaust, he was only two when restrictions against the Jews were enacted. His family's Purim celebration, fresh cookies and a Megillah reading, was confined to their home.

But for all older adults, Purim, the holiday that celebrates the survival of the Jewish people, provides an opportunity to reflect, to recapture childhood memories and to create new ones.

Remembering Iraqi Jewry

I just returned from viewing a documentary film on the Jews of Iraq. Produced by Carol Basri, it focused on the forced exodus from Iraq of a community that had been there for more than 2,500 years. It explored the harassment, the trepidation and the ultimate loss that began in the 1930s and lasted until the 1970s. It portrayed a history that few Jews know. Out of almost 200,000 Jews who once lived in Iraq, only 22 are left.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

I sat among members of that community, some of whom were interviewed in the film, and some of whom I have interviewed myself. I know and respect these people and was fascinated to share their shared experience. I watched their memories hover in their eyes – sad and good times remembered; fear and love, joy and worry all brought to the surface after many years of contented living. And I marvelled at our multifaceted Jewish world. We come from all over the world, we settled in many places, we managed to adapt, to "make it," and to remember.

Challenged to remember by the biblical commandment of "Zachor," we carry forth our memories of both the good and the bad with defiance, but somehow without debilitating romanticism or bitterness. The Iraqi community prides itself on its rich cultural heritage. Yet it got on with the business of reconstituting itself elsewhere. In Israel, London, Montreal, New York and California, its members turned their backs on Iraq, but not on their heritage as Iraqi Jews.

Getting ready for Purim, I can't help but note the prevalence of memory-driven rituals and celebrations in our religion. And while Purim forces us into a parody of memory, insisting on hearing Haman's name so we can wipe it out, it is a memory that is inscribed in our communal spirit through perennial historical episodes. During the film, viewers sneered at their own Haman, Saddam Hussein. So the story continues. We remember and create memories anew.

This film will be used in many ways. It constitutes testimony against Saddam, as individuals remembered his personal participation in their torture. It engages Palestinian refugee claims, as it is evidence of the hundreds of thousands of Jews who were forced to leave Arab lands. Politically, it connects these Jews to the general human rights issues in the Middle East.

For some, it represents an intriguing exploration of another exotic Jewish community. For scholars, it embodies a treasured example of ethnographic documentaries.

But for Iraqi Jews, it is their life, and it will enable their children to hear and understand. It will forge a link in their own continuity and memory. And for all of us, it will enrich our sense of who we are and how wonderful our heritage is.

Thanks for the memories

"Whenever Russian leaders attempt to change the future, they begin by attacking the past." (Westworld, spring 2005).

How true that is. When Soviet leader Lavrenty Beria fell from grace, his entire biography was altered in the Soviet Encyclopedia. Others were simply airbrushed out of history.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

The change of history to fit the present, or the future, is well documented in antiquity. Pharaoh number 2 erased inscriptions of Pharaoh number 1 and inserted his version of events, with himself as the victorious conqueror, and so it went.

An inclination to change the past to fit a new reality seems inescapable. Three thousand years ago, or 30, no occurrence is beyond our ability to manipulate. "Memory," as Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi observes in his book Zachor: Jewish History and Jewish Memory, "is among the most fragile and capricious of our faculties."

So maybe that is why we are commanded twice: "'Remember!' Amalek and what he did. 'Don't forget!' that he attacked the weak and defenseless."

We consider ourselves to be a people of history. We never forget a wrong, or a kindness either, but remembering goodness seems harder than remembering the bad. We remember the expulsion from Spain, and forget the Golden Age. We remember the persecutions of Antiochus but forget centuries lived in peace after the return from Babylon.

We remember Auschwitz, but forget the emancipation in Europe that brought us out of the ghetto and gave us a chance to enter into modernity, with all its challenges and opportunities.

Shabbat Zachor, just before Purim, gives us a deep appreciation of the commandment to remember what Amalek's tribe did to us when we were most vulnerable. When we read the Megillah, we are reliving a historic moment of national salvation standing for all our escapes from destruction as a people. Haman, as the descendent of Amalek, faces off against Mordechai, the descendent of Saul.

The rabbis believed that history has a purpose: it will end with the messianic era of universal peace when all nations will recognize the sovereignty of one God. To the biblical writer, all history is a working out of God's purpose for the world. History, then, is directed from above. To remember, therefore, is a religious imperative. That is quite a heavy burden for history to carry.

Modern historians like Yerushalmi do not accept these premises. History has no ultimate purpose – it is a record of human activities with no discernible interference from cosmic forces. There is no apocalyptic end to history, nor will a deus ex machina appear to solve the world's conflicts.

As a people who live by remembering our history, how to reconcile these two opposite assumptions? Jacob Neusner suggests that we do this through midrash, the rabbinic way of reconstructing the biblical past so that it speaks to current situations. Another is the current scholarly way of looking at texts with a variety of tools: literary, historical, rabbinic and linguistic – whatever makes the ancient writings speak to us, rather than trying to harmonize what stubbornly resists harmony.

I suggest we accept contradictions. In fact, we already do accept them. Look at Purim. We spend a whole night and morning reading the book of Esther, enjoined to blot out the best-known name in our history after Jacob and Moses – Haman. We listen intently for his name, then "blot it out" by making an incredible racket. Hardly the way to "forget" something.

We explain our redemption from Egypt partly because the Jews did not change their names or their garments. But Esther is named for a pagan goddess, Ashtarte, and Mordechai's name means "Marduk (the pagan god) lives." It is also unlikely that Esther caught the eye of the king dressed in modest, Israelite garb.

So let's face it. We remember in order not to forget exactly what we are to blot out of the mind: the relentless intent of one nation to destroy another, and the salvation that can rescue both from destruction.

In fact, maybe the reason we are told Purim will be the only holiday celebrated in the messianic era is that, no matter what your take on the holiday, it can accommodate all points of view: traditional, literal, post-modern, whatever. All Jews, and everyone else, too, will celebrate this rescue.

After all, Esther saved not only her own people, but she allowed the rather silly king to save his own nation from coming under the sway of the evil Haman. It is, as they say, a win-win situation and one we, and all nations, would do well to remember.

Chag Purim Samayach.

The evil of Holocaust denial

We read frequently of the court battles and subsequent deportation of Ernst Zundel after years of anti-Semitic hate mongering. We also recall the trial of David Irving in England. They are just two examples of purveyors of hate who include in their hideous and misguided assertion of "free speech" the common denominator of Holocaust denial.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

What is it about Holocaust denial that is so sinister and disturbing?

Holocaust denial is a perverted rejection of historical truth. It is a fictionalization of history. The denial trivializes the personal histories of survivors and their relatives as well as the relatives of those who perished. It robs the victims of their entitlement to be remembered and mourned. In a sense, it robs the victims of both the significance of their lives and the horrors of their murders.

Holocaust denial attempts to deprive all Jews of an essential element of our history – our collective psyche. And, in so doing, it deprives the world of a further lesson in the history of man's inhumanity toward man.

Holocaust denial attempts to erase from all memory a society's willingness to engage in mass murder with little public resistance and much encouragement and co-operation.

Holocaust denial also serves to tarnish modern Judaism as it strives to make liars and opportunists of those that rightfully strive to preserve the memory and respect with dignity of those suffered so much.

It is true that the world has apparently learned very little about the insidiousness of genocide in the intervening years. Reflecting on the Holocaust reminds us of other campaigns of genocide that sadly mark the history of civilization. There are the ravages of ethnic cleansing in the Baltics, wholesale genocide in Rwanda and the ongoing scourge in Sudan.

In addition, the appropriation of the term "holocaust" to describe other acts of genocide is also disturbing as it is nothing less than a form of minimization of the Jewish European experience. Memories of past abuses of this nature, together with these modern scourges, have led to a description of the Nazi extermination machine as the so-called "Jewish Holocaust." It has caused many Jewish scholars and others to describe the Holocaust as the Shoah, thus avoiding the use of the term "Holocaust" and once again identifying our experience as the unique, unprecedented event that it truly was.

No one wishes to minimize the suffering of others throughout history but the term "Holocaust," first used by Nobel Peace Prize-winner Elie Weisel, uniquely describes the systematic horrors and mass murders experienced by European Jews at the hands of Nazi Germany. Its use in other contexts serves to detract from or even minimize the Jewish experience during the 1930s and '40s.

I am sure psychologists have a lot to say and analyze about the pathology of hate and how Holocaust denial plays an integral role in the dynamics of that pathology. But common sense also tells us that Holocaust denial is another weapon in the prevailing arsenal of those that thrive on the promulgation of anti-Semitism.

The Holocaust re-entered the public's consciousness in Canada with the recent attention paid to the commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz followed a few short weeks later by news reports on the deportation of Canada's most notorious Holocaust denier, Zundel, to Germany, where he was immediately arrested and charged with inciting hatred against Jews. With the end of a prolonged battle in the courts, Zundel was finally removed from Canadian soil after years of promulgating hatred while in Canada and for a period doing the same over U.S. radio stations and on the Internet.

As Elie Weisel wrote: "Let us remember, let us remember the heroes of Warsaw, the martyrs of Treblinka, the children of Auschwitz. They fought alone, they suffered alone, they lived alone, but they did not die alone, for something in all of us died with them. That memory must always live with us and in future generations."

The evil of Holocaust denial is essentially that it represents an attempt to erase or subvert or distort that memory. The Zundels of this world seek to perpetuate that evil, while it is the responsibility of all of us to remain vigilant and counter these distortions whenever and wherever they occur.

The Kirshner File

A story about German settlers in Palestine

When he was 16 and on holiday with his parents in Scotland, Sebastian Hope found out his real grandfather was a German hotelier who had been born and raised in Palestine. The revelation touched off a journey of discovery that opened his eyes to his Teutonic ancestors and the Templer community – which flourished in Palestine from the last third of the 19th century to the outbreak of World War II – and prompted him to write an intriguing book, Hotel Tiberias: A Tale of Two Grandfathers (HarperCollins).

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Until the day his mother, Brigitte, set him right, Hope had been under the impression that John Winthrop Hackett – a British army general who had served in Palestine in the 1930s and commanded British troops in Germany during the height of the Cold War and in Northern Ireland in the late 1960s – was his grandfather.

In fact, Hackett was Hope's step-grandfather by virtue of having married Hope's grandmother. Hope's biological grandfather, Fritz Grossmann, was the co-owner and manager of the Hotel Tiberias until he committed suicide in 1938 at 30. His forebears had settled in Palestine in the late 1860s.

Grossmann was the son of Richard Julius, a Templer from Stuttgart who died in Tiberias, on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, in 1916 at the age of 42. He and his mother, Frieda,who were born in Palestine, were members of a Templer community.

The story of the Templers, which forms the backbone of Hotel Tiberias, is what is most interesting about this unusual book.

The Templers were evangelical Christians whose mystical beliefs about the End of Days, as chronicled in the Book of Revelations, encouraged them to immigrate to Palestine to prepare the country for the return of the Jews.

Their guiding spirit, Christoph Hoffmann, visited Palestine, a desolate Ottoman backwater, in 1858. Taking his vision of redemption one step further, he and his acolytes established the Friends of Jerusalem, a religious society whose goal was to raise a spiritual temple of true believers in Jerusalem.

Twenty five Templers arrived in Palestine between 1865 and 1867, of whom 15 had died by 1868. The rest settled in Nazareth.

As Hope points out, they were not the first Protestants in the Holy Land. A group of 156 Americans, equipped with prefabricated housing, settled on the outskirts of Jaffa in 1866.

When the American novelist Mark Twain reached them a year later, he found them in a sorry state. Their colony, he wrote, was "a complete fiasco."

The Templers, on the other hand, were successful. In Haifa, at the foot of Mount Carmel, they raised cattle and produced wine grapes. Finding very little good soil on land they had purchased in Jaffa, they acquired promising new lots in Sarona, where the present-day Israeli army headquarters in Tel Aviv is located.

Learning from French colonists in Algeria, they planted eucalyptus trees to drain the swamps and cultivated orange groves, winter wheat and vegetables for export. In Jerusalem, Templers built the first steam mill and opened a hotel to cater to the nascent tourist business. Templers also founded colonies in Wilhelma, south of Jaffa, and in Waldheim and Bethlehem, on the road from Haifa to Nazareth.

In 1898, when Theodor Herzl visited Palestine for the first and only time to lobby Kaiser Wilhelm II on behalf of the Zionist cause, 1,343 Templers lived there.

They were the first Europeans since the Crusaders to establish a foothold in Palestine.

By that juncture, Templer colonies were positively thriving, with German settlers having brought to Palestine new skills in the fields of construction, architecture, engineering, surveying, metalworking, medicine and education.

Hope claims that some of the first Jewish settlements in Palestine were modelled after Templer colonies. Baron Edmond de Rothschild engaged a Templer from Haifa, Gottlieb Schumacher, to draw up plans for the building of wine cellars at Rishon Lezion and to survey and divide the site of Zichron Yaakov.

According to Hope, Templers and Jewish settlers got along cordially. Jewish pupils went to Templer schools and Jewish settlements were an important market for Templer dairy products.

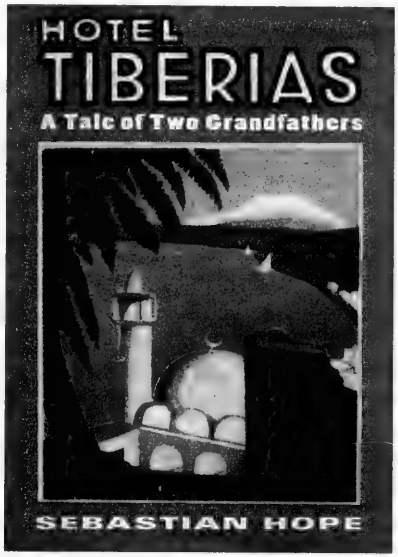
Templer relations with the Arab population were mixed.

As German citizens, Templers were required to enlist in the German army. When World War I broke out in 1914, Templer soldiers fought in southern Palestine with their Turkish allies. Templer colonies provided them with supplies and transportation.

With the defeat of German and Ottoman forces in 1918, the majority of German settlers in Palestine were deported to camps in Egypt and their colonies were razed. But in 1920 and 1921, they were permitted to return and rebuild their homes.

By this point, the Hotel Tiberias, which had opened in the 1890s, was a going concern.

Traveller's Gazette, a publication issued by the travel retailer Thomas Cook, described it as the most comfortable hostelry in Palestine. Gertrude Bell, the legendary British traveller and writer who stayed there in 1902, called it "a nice little hotel."



The Grossmanns, the proprietors of the hotel, were the biggest employers in Tiberias, which depended on the tourist trade. During the British Mandate period, civil servants and army officers frequented the Hotel Tiberias, which bought much of its meat and produce from Jewish settlements in the vicinity.

Templer elders apparently were not enthusiastic about the rise of Nazism in Germany, fearing that Palestinian Jews would boycott their various businesses.

Accordingly, they petitioned German consulates in Palestine not to fly the swastika flag, but to no avail.

In the battle for hearts and minds in Templer colonies, Nazi ideology prevailed, Hope says. New teachers from Germany taught Templer children the Horst Wessel song and Templers joined branches of the Hitler Youth.

By the end of 1935, when 1,300 Templers resided in Palestine, 250 of them, including Fritz Grossmann's cousin in Haifa, belonged to the Nazi party. In the face of these ominous developments, the Templer leadership tried in vain to maintain good ties with the Yishuv.

With World War II looming, 247 able-bodied Templers enlisted in the Wehrmacht. After hostilities erupted, the British interned Templers or confined them to their settlements. In July 1941, 536 Templers were taken by train to Suez and shipped to special camps in Australia.

The Grossmanns moved to the German Colony in Jerusalem. Subsequently, they were detained as enemy aliens in a camp near Tel Aviv before being released and permitted again to live in Jerusalem.

During World War II, Wilhelma was subjected to drive-by shootings and the mayor of Sarona was assassinated. As the end of the Mandate approached in 1948, the Haganah raided Wilhelma. During the raid, three Templers were killed.

In May of that year, the British deported virtually all the Templers to Cyprus. The last remaining ones, residents of Jerusalem, were asked to leave the country by the new Israeli government. They departed on April 13, 1950.

The Hotel Tiberias was temporarily captured by Arab forces during the War of Independence, and then expropriated by Israel.

Today, the hotel is a youth hostel, and the lido on the private beach the Grossmanns added to the hotel is a restaurant owned by a family of Romanian Jewish bakers.

Tiberias has come a long way as a resort since the heyday of the Grossmanns, and in Hotel Tiberias, Hope recounts their lives and that of their fellow Templers with German thoroughness and British panache.

Bringing God closer to us

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

Rabbinic Reflections

There is a great attraction among some young people in our time to travel to India in pursuit of the spiritual moment. For young Israelis, including many who have just completed their army service, India is an "in" destination, both because it is inexpensive and because it has an alluring spirituality.

I never fully understood the allure of Indian and Tibetan spirituality, both because of my skeptical, rationalist upbringing and because I find Judaism to be so rich in spiritual satisfaction.

However, its spiritual satisfaction is "inner driven" and not "outer absorbed."

Let me explain what I mean by drawing on this week's parshah.

The beginning of the book of Leviticus, Vayikra, presents a view of man's approach to the Divine in a vivid but almost surreal manner. The book describes the sacrifices and the rules of these sacrifices, and it comes on the heels of the description of the elaborate building of a sanctuary, later the great Temple in Jerusalem.

What is the religious feeling in these ceremonies? What did the Jew bringing her sacrifices feel at that moment? Was it joy, sadness, contrite feelings, elation, subservience or grandeur? Was it a feeling of human greatness, or one of human frailty? Was it a feeling of Hashem's awesome power, or one of human power? Was it a feeling of partnership with the Creator or the meekness of man?

I don't really know what a Jew felt bringing her offering, but I can guess from the feeling that I get when reading about it. I would think the walk up to the Temple Mount would have been awe-inspiring. The building was grand, with its gold, colours, pomp and music. Upon entering the Temple grounds, the Jew was required to bow face down, spread eagle – expressing total subjugation, and almost negation, in the face of the grandeur symbolizing the Divine.

The Jew in Temple times had an opportunity to be "wowed," to be overcome, to be acted upon by the richness of the symbolic world around him and to feel humbled, as the servant in the face of the Master of the Universe.

Today, we have none of that. We don't have the "House of the Master" – we only have our home. We are not acted upon by the grandeur – we have to create it. We don't step into His Home – He steps into ours.

We have to create our own spiritual moment. We are not passive subjects being acted upon by the grandeur around us. We create the grandeur. We do not bow down subservient in our synagogues, spread eagle, face on the ground. We stand up and walk into Hashem's presence. Our main prayers are said while standing. We meet the Shchinah, the Divine Presence, standing tall. On Friday evenings in Lecha Dodi, we invite the Shchinah into our midst.

The desire for spirituality is, to some extent, the desire for someone else, something else, something outside of us to inspire us, to move us, to draw us, to lift us up. Judaism wants us to draw Him to us, to move the Shchinah closer to us – we are to walk into Her Presence.

It is much easier to be inspired from the outside, but it is deep and fulfilling to invite the Divine into our home and into our hearts.

Will someone say Kaddish with me?

By AVRON SHORE

My mother no longer comprehends what is going on around her. She is almost 100 years old, and until recently, she was a vibrant, bustling individual who enjoyed life to the fullest and gladdened the hearts of all who knew her. She has been a wonderful mother – the best – but now, she is as helpless as a baby.

I doubt if she knows I feed her lunch every day, but I do know that, at some deep level, she understands I will perform the ultimate mitzvah for her. After she has gone on to the world to come, I will say Kaddish for her.

It would be more accurate to say I hope I will be able to say Kaddish for her, because it might not be possible. It is getting harder and harder to find a minyan. Our synagogues are practically empty on Shabbat. What is heartbreaking is not having a minyan for Minchah or Ma'ariv. Too many Jewish men no longer go to shul on a regular basis or make it part of their schedules to be part of a minyan.

To say Kaddish, you must have a minyan – in most congregations, a group of 10 adult males. The prayer is recited on behalf of all the Jewish people, emphasizing our responsibility for one another and our interlinked fates. By saying Kaddish, you are first honouring God, and then you are honouring your father and/or your mother.

Over the years, I have often been part of a minyan so that this sacred duty can be performed by a friend, a relative, a stranger. It has not been an imposition. Rather, it has helped to strengthen me and to assist in my understanding of who I really am – a Jew.

Our synagogues have wonderful members who have fulfilled their responsibilities and have said Kaddish for their parents. But sadly, their children are not fulfilling this obligation, and their children, the grandchildren, are witnessing this lapse.

Somewhere along the way, we seem to have lost our sense of responsibility for one another. We have busy lives. Work demands a lot from us. Most of us consider our families more important than strangers. But in perspective, the Jewish people form such a miniscule percentage of the six billion people on this planet that, in one way or another, we are all interconnected and are not really "strangers" after all.

Still, we often don't feel a need or an urgency to do the little things that define us Jews. But we have to stop and ask ourselves how many commandments we can violate or not carry out before we are no longer Jews. Can we pick and choose? Maybe. It seems to me that the commandments associated with the life cycle, most importantly, remind us of who we are: we hold a bris for our baby boys, we help our sons prepare for their bar mitzvahs, we get married under a chupah, and when our parents die, we say Kaddish.

It is a sad day when a parent dies. But if a mourner cannot say Kaddish, imagine how this adds, unnecessarily, to his distress.

It doesn't have to be like this. To be part of a minyan takes about 30 minutes out of your day. If you make a commitment to come to shul only one day a month – one day – it would make a big difference. You would be doing a mitzvah by giving comfort to those who have to say Kaddish. You would also be teaching your children, by example, the importance of fulfilling the mitzvah. And it's like insurance – you will be increasing the likelihood of someone saying Kaddish for you.

Surely this is a mitzvah you can live with: 30 minutes one day a month, 12 times a year. Or maybe our synagogues will make it a part of your commitment: once you become a member, you must perform "Jewry duty" one week every year.

So help a fellow Jew perform his obligation. He can't do it alone.

Sharing the love of reading

A Reading Diary by Alberto Manguel, Random House.

We tend to forget that a book is a miracle. By means of 26 letters, intricate symbols of communication, abstract thoughts and ideas are conveyed.

Across the span of centuries, without regard to geography, the book speaks. It has the power to teach, inspire, activate and delight. It can open windows on new horizons, foment revolution and sustain the troubled spirit. It is no wonder that Charles Lamb maintained that there is more reason for saying grace before one begins a new book than before a meal. For a meal and its satisfactions are soon forgotten, but the power and influence of a worthy book are unending.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Despite vast technological change, the book is not about to disappear. It may be altered to meet changing needs and conditions, but it will not be supplanted. What will not change is the power of the book, as Ralph Waldo Emerson said, "to speak to us, arouse us, terrify us, teach us, comfort us and open its heart to us as a brother."

These reflections about the enduring pleasures of reading and the singular power of the book come irresistibly to mind after enjoying Alberto Manguel's latest offering.

In A Reading Diary, the author shares his love of books through 12 of his favourites, as he re-reads them over the course of a year. Some of the titles are familiar: Kim, Don Quixote, Surfacing, The Wind in the Willows and The Sign of Four. Others are more obscure: The Invention of Morel by Adolfo Bioy Casares, The Tartar Steppe by Dino Buzzati, The Pillow-Book by Sei Shonagon and Memoirs from Beyond the Grave by François René, vicomte de Chateaubriand.

What struck the author when he returned to some of his favourite books was how pertinent and apt they seemed. A newspaper article or a controversial conversation would suddenly be illuminated by a passage or quotation in the novel he was reading. Books became a stimulus for exploring the interconnectedness between the world of literature and the vast, many-sided often chaotic "real world."

A Jew, born in Argentina – now a Canadian citizen – Manguel discusses several matters of Jewish interest. He describes a silver mezuzah, given to him by the author Yehuda Elberg, which he "fixed onto the right-hand doorpost of my writing room, as the injunction in Deuteronomy commands. Following tradition, I placed it diagonally, a compromise reached between those medieval Talmudists who argued for the horizontal position and those who preferred the vertical."

He is distressed at the prevalence of anti-Semitism in detective novels of the 20th century. "Agatha Christie, John Dickson Carr, Dorothy L.Sayers, E.C.R. Lorac… Even after Hitler, there seems to be, in the British imagination, a fixed caricature of the Jew, often damned with ludicrous praise."

In one novel, a character declares that "the real pure-blooded Jew is one of the best fellows in the world. It's the hybrid Jew, the Russian and Polish and German variety, that's let the race down so badly." This, laments Manguel, is England, 1928.

A Reading Diary is something between a personal diary and a commonplace book. It includes childhood memories, travel experiences, telling anecdotes, interesting personalities met and a clutch of maxims and aphorisms, old and new.

Manguel would have it that "every book exists in a dreamlike condition until the hands that open it and the eyes that peruse it stir the words into awareness." Many readers of this rewarding book will experience such an awakening.

Pre-Purim humour

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Q. Where is the first tennis match mentioned in the Bible?

A. When Joseph served in Pharaoh's court.

Oy! Purim is almost here so that means it's the month of Adar. According to Jewish tradition, this is the month in which we increase our happiness. Today, my humble effort to brighten your Adar.

Perhaps the best humour is rooted in reality. Richard Lederer proved that point when he compiled his biblical bloopers – actual mistakes made by students from around the world. "In the first book of the Bible, Guinessis, God got tired of creating the world, so he took the Sabbath off. Adam and Eve were created from an apple tree. Noah's wife was called Joan of Ark. Noah built an ark, which the animals came on to in pears. Lot's wife was a pillar of salt by day, but a ball of fire by night. Moses died before he ever reached Canada. Then, Joshua led the Hebrews in the battle of Geritol. David was a Hebrew king skilled at playing the liar. He fought with the Finkelsteins, a race of people who lived in biblical times. Solomon, one of David's sons, had 300 wives and 700 porcupines." [www.scheinerman.net/judaism/humor/]

Q. Noah's ark was built in three stories, and the top storey had a window to let light in, but how did they get light to the bottom two storeys?

A. They used floodlights.

A website that I enjoy belongs to Esther and Polly Fleagleman. They have created a humorous site that reflects what seems to be two delightful lives. You'll find everything from recipes (why say it with flowers when you can say it with brisket?) to The Art of Collecting Sweet-'n'Low (Collecting is not stealing! If there is more than they need, you are just doing a mitzvah so they shouldn't waste it!) The Fleaglemans claim to be sisters but with names like Polly and Esther, hmm. [http://tinyurl.com/6kg54]

Lovers of poetry will be familiar with haiku, three-lined Japanese poems usually composed of five, seven and five syllables. Well, David M. Bader has performed a bit of cross-cultural pollination in his Haikus for Jews (For You, A Little Wisdom) and has come up with a few winners.

- Is one Nobel Prize so much to ask from a child after all I've done?
- Shatner and Nimoy observing Shabbos – "Scotty, beam up a minyan."
- Cherry blos$oms bloom.
- Sure, it's beautiful, but is it good for the Jews? [http://mssamantics.us/haiku/jewish.htm]

Anyone who has sat through a few minutes of a telethon knows how terribly earnest they can be. You won't feel that way once you see this clip from the Chabad of California telethon. Let's just say you'll find out just what happens when you bid for the biggest prize of all, a rabbi to call to call your own… and he comes home with you. [www.intercastlive.com/lchaim/2003/lchaim0318h.wmv] Tip: If you have trouble viewing the clip, open the Windows Media Player application, click on "Open URL" and paste in the address. (Thanks to Yizchok Rossler for passing this gem of a clip along to me.)

Q. Who was the greatest male financier in the Bible?

A. Noah. He was floating his stock while everyone else was in liquidation.

In the Minyan Penal Code, some synagogue-goers address the decorum problem that plagues many congregations by recommending a violation and fine schedule. Sample violations and fines: "Taking the seat of person called to Torah – fine-$72; and taking seat of the rabbi during the speech – fine-$360 (fine waived if the speech is longer than 30 minutes)." [http://tinyurl.com/5hjbv]

Q. Who was the greatest female financier in the Bible?

A. Pharaoh's daughter. She went down to the bank of the Nile and drew out a little prophet.

As mentioned, Purim is just around the corner. Thanks to Ohr Somayach, I leave you with some of the ways to know you've drunk enough on Purim. [www.ohr.org.il/yhiy.php/top_10s/]

- You hold a volume of the Babylonian Talmud upside down, thinking, "Hey, they finally decoded the human genome!"
- You ask people how many candles they lit last night.
- You argue with hamantaschen… and lose.

Have a very happy Adar!

A passionate plea for tolerance and peace

One on one with Judea Pearl

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Dr. Judea Pearl, father of journalist Daniel Pearl, who was murdered in Pakistan, visited Toronto recently talking to audiences about tolerance and hope. Recently, Dr. Pearl began a speaking tour where he has teamed up with a Muslim colleague, Akbar Ahmed, Chair of Islamic Studies, American University. Jewish Toronto's writer Taali Lester Tollman sat down with Pearl to talk about his son Daniel, Israel, antisemitism and the state of our world. His visit was sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto, which is supported by UJA Federation.

Judea Pearl

In the face of Daniel's devastating murder, how did you not lose your faith in humanity and, in fact, try to turn it into something positive?

A. It was not a rational decision; it was a compulsion. We wanted to turn this tragedy into something positive, and we wanted to do it in the most effective way with what methods are available to us. We have an opportunity here, the Muslim world is reaching out to us. They gave me a chance to address Muslim youngsters, to explain to them what Zionism is. I have to take advantage of this.

Daniel's last words before he was murdered were, "My father is Jewish; my mother is Jewish; I am Jewish." Why do you think that was his last statement?

A. My theory is that his captors said "tell us something about your background". He probably related to them a much longer monologue then the one that you see, but they had cut and pasted only those sentences which to them seem to be a justification for what they planned.

When you hear about these terrorist events happening in the name of religion and the name of G-d, how does it make you feel about religion?

A. The same as I always felt about religion; it can be used and misused. Religion has been misused by evil people throughout history.

Q. Why did the men who murdered your son play the Jewish card?

A. Because their audience hates Jews. It is as simple as that. From what I understand, 85% of the people in Pakistan hate Jews. To them, Jews represent everything that is anti-Muslim. Jews represent a force of evil in their eyes, and it is much worse in Saudi Arabia. And they used the video of Daniel's execution to recruit terrorists in Saudi Arabia.

Q. There has been a recent resurgence of anti-semitism around the world. In your opinion what are the reasons for this?

A. If you take the position that Israel has no right to exist and that Zionism is evil, then it is a reasonable thing; the logical implication is that Jews should be hated, because statistically speaking most Jews are for Israel. So, if Israel is evil, then the natural implication is that Jews ought to be weakened, hated, and marginalized. It is only when we expose anti-Zionism for what it is, racism - that we realize that the premise is wrong. Israel is not evil, and Zionism is a beautiful project, one of the noblest projects of the 20th century, so the whole premise of antisemitism falls apart.

What frightens you about the future for humanity, for Jews?

A. It frightens me that we let patterns of hate propagate unchecked, unidentified, under the guise of political righteousness, I just started talking on campuses. My first campus talk was at Duke, and I see how much confusion there is.

But you know that it is so difficult on campuses, especially with those students who see themselves as left wing, pro-Palestinian.

A. I am pro-Palestinian, too. Never use this word to label those who hate Israel, they are not pro-Palestinian, because as you know the majority of Palestinians are Zionists. Once you start saying that, the whole discussion comes to a different level. Fifty-four per cent of Palestinians endorse a two-state solution, and isn't that what Zionism is all about?

Q. And those students who argue for a one-state solution, as the only solution?

A. They are obstacles to peace, and the way to fight it is with gloves off. A one-state solution is a euphemism for genocide.

Q. How did you begin your work with Ikbar Ahmed?

A. I searched for a Muslim who was courageous enough to speak for moderation. I got a recommendation and called his office and I told him that I would like to do a dialogue with a Muslim and he was excited, and we went on the road.

Did anything truly unexpected come out of your presentations with Ahmed?

A. Yes, the fact that some excerpts of the presentation were published in Riyadh, Karachi, Beirut and Bangladesh. Perhaps Muslim children will finally learn the truth.

Then and now is a new feature that updates events previously covered in Jewish Toronto

Montreal's United Talmud Torah rises from the ashes

On April 5, 2004, the Beutel campus of Montreal's United Talmud Torah (UTT) Jewish day school became a victim of arson, when its library was firebombed the night before Passover. Approximately 15,000 books, along with all the library's furniture and computers were destroyed in the fire.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto responded immediately to Jewish Montreal's plight by creating the UTT Library Fund. More than 1,000 Torontonians responded and approximately $80,000 was raised.

"Toronto was truly amazing," explained Rachel Cohen, president of the Board of UTT.

"They came through for us like we've never seen; they gave us more than a financial impetus to go on, they raised our spirits."

Since that act of hate last spring, much has been accomplished to rebuild not only the school library but the hearts and minds of those students who use it.

Beyond reconstructing the library, which is now replete with new computers, shelves and books, the community received a huge outpouring of support and recognition. Every province in Canada responded, whether it was financial resources or other types of donations. That went a long way to healing the spirits of all the affected children. Further funds went into improving the safety of the school, with the instillation of exterior lights, a new fire alarm and a security camera system.

The Azrieli Library, named for the family of David Azrieli, the chief donor to the library, now houses over 8,000 new books donated from across Canada, from an Anglican Church in North Vancouver to elementary schools in Ontario and Nova Scotia. Another 5,000 books were purchased with dollars received in cash donations.

On the first night of Chanuka last December, a rededication of the library took place where communities from across Canada were recognized for their aid during Montreal's time in need.

Molly Mann, Chair of the UTT Library Rebuilding Committee reiterated Rachel Cohen's strong sentiments.

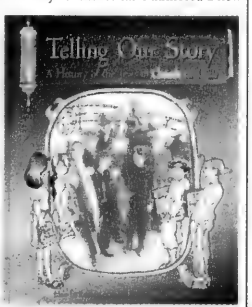
"It was so meaningful for us to receive that type of support from Toronto. It was really touching," she said thoughtfully. "We just want to say a really big thank you!"

New BJE book tells our story

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

It's not often that a teacher is greeted with a standing ovation from a classroom full of students, but that's what happened recently when Dr. Jack Lipinsky walked into his class at Toronto's United Synagogue Day School.

Lipinsky is one of three teachers from UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) affiliated day schools to have authored a new book, Telling Our Story – A History of the Jews in Canada to 1920. Having collaborated with Meir Balofsky and Donnie Friedman, the book is the first of its kind in Canada, aimed at students in grades seven and eight.



"When they saw my book, my Grade 8 class gave me a standing ovation and spent all period quelling over the pictures," says Lipinsky.

The book, which complements the Ontario history curriculum for grades seven and eight, recounts the history of Canadian Jewry from its beginnings through the aftermath of the First World War. It was made possible through the generosity of the Max and Beatrice Wolfe Charitable Foundation and the BJE resources.

The inspiration for the project came from the BJE's Etgar (Challenge) Program, created by Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's Senior Vice President for Jewish Education & Identity. The program was created to provide incentives for teachers within the BJE system to develop innovative educational materials.

"This book – as a product of the Etgar process – is a perfect illustration of how incentives to creative teachers, who are devoted to their task, can produce results that enhance the curricular atmosphere of our schools," says Epstein.

"My parents and grandparents never let me forget how fortunate we were to be Jews living in Canada," says Friedman, one of the authors. "I had them in mind when researching and writing."

"I always found it unfortunate that I graduated from the Jewish day school system in Toronto without any exposure to the history of Jews in Canada," adds Balofsky from his home in Israel after making aliyah in August. "Working on this project gave me the opportunity to help create a resource that will help the youth of our community develop some religious and national pride."

For more information, or to order a copy of the book, call the BJE at 416-633-7770.

Walk with Israel's new mascot ready to roar

Walk scheduled for May 29

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

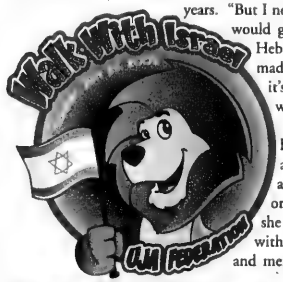
UJA Federation's Walk with Israel 2005, the largest one-day solidarity walk in support of Israel, is set to take place on May 29th, starting at Coronation Park across from the CNE's Princes' Gates. The Walk will wind its way for six kilometres through downtown Toronto, finishing at the RioCan Festival, at Ontario Place, which will offer games, rides and a kosher barbeque.

This year's Walk will feature its first-ever mascot. A city-wide contest to name the Walk with Israel's friendly lion inspired over 250 children to get involved. With as many names to choose from as there were children who had entered them, the competition was stiff. In the end one name rose to the top and Arr-Yeah the Lion was born (Aryeh is Hebrew for lion).

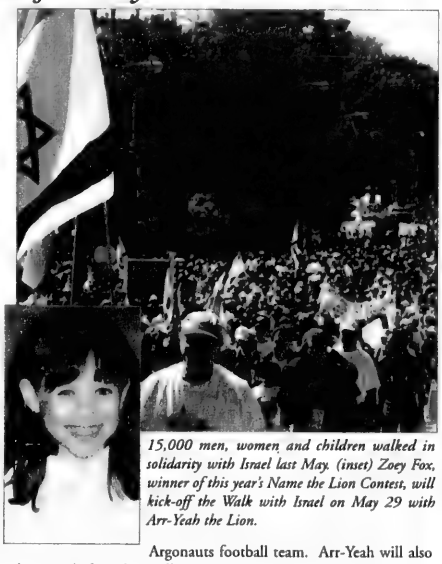
"We wanted to add something new and exciting to what has become the most popular family oriented, community-wide event of the year," said Sara Zagdanski, co-chair of this year's Walk, with her three sisters-in-law, Felicia Posluns, Beth Singer and Nelly Zagdanski. "The response to the contest was so overwhelming, we can't wait to see Arr-Yeah in action," she explained.

Eight-year-old Zoey Fox, a student at Leo Baeck Day School, came up with Arr-Yeah and was thrilled to have her name chosen as the winner.

"I thought it would be fun to try and name the mascot," gushed Fox, who has participated in the Walk for the past several years. "But I never thought my name would get picked. I took the Hebrew word for lion and made it sound like a cheer; it's really cool that I won."



Naming the mascot has won Fox tickets to a Raptors game, in addition to being honored at the event where she will kick off the Walk with Arr-Yeah the Lion and members of the Toronto Argonauts football team. Arr-Yeah will also be seen before the Walk at various community events, gearing people up for the big day.



15,000 men, women and children walked in solidarity with Israel last May. (inset) Zoey Fox, winner of this year's Name the Lion Contest, will kick-off the Walk with Israel on May 29 with Arr-Yeah the Lion.

This year's Walk with Israel is expected to attract record numbers in support of Israel and enable the Jewish community to express their pride in Israel's countless accomplishments since the State was created 57 years ago.

"It so important to join this years' Walk and show a united front against antisemitism, anti-Zionism and to demonstrate our overall solidarity for Israel," Zagdanski said.

Ontario top cops inspired by Israel

The Ontario Police Security Personnel Mission to Israel, sponsored by UJA Federation, Canadian Jewish Congress and the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police, recently returned after an insightful week of touring and information gathering. The five-day mission was co-chaired by Ontario's Community Safety and Correctional Services Minister, Monte Kwinter, York Region's Police Chief Armand La Barge and CJC Ontario Region chair Joel Richler. Participants on the mission felt inspired by what they learned and saw.

The mission included: former Toronto Police Chief Julian Fantino, who is now Ontario's Commissioner of Emergency Management, as well as Dr. James Young, Federal Commissioner of Emergency Management and senior adviser on security and forensics to Canada's Deputy Prime Minister Anne McLellan, the Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness. Participants were offered a first-hand look at how Israel meets its security and policing challenges while also providing the unique opportunity to exchange ideas and information with Israel's police elite.

"It was gratifying to see the extremely positive response from Ontario's top cops to the security services witnessed in Israel," said Morris Zbar, Senior Vice President, Operations and Corporate Relations at UJA Federation. "Much was learned in terms of security coordination and more importantly, all participants have a much better appreciation of the political and security challenges Israel faces on a daily basis."

Speaking out

This week's perspective focuses on the recent deportation of Holocaust - denier Ernst Zundel.

Zundel affair ends Truth finally emerges

By BERNIE M. FARBER,
National Chief Executive Officer,
Canadian Jewish Congress

The Canadian chapter of the "Zundel Affair" came to an end on March 1, 2005 when Canadian authorities placed Ernst Zundel on a plane bound for Germany, where he will face charges for Holocaust denial, a criminal offence in that country.

Many Canadians wonder why it took two years. In fact, the legal battles involving Zundel go back much further, to November 1983 when Zundel was charged under the "false news" section of the Canadian Criminal Code. Zundel was found guilty in this matter and appealed. A second trial was ordered and he was again found guilty and sentenced to nine months in prison. A second appeal was denied. Zundel then sought leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada where, in 1992, the "false news" section of the Criminal Code was deemed to be unconstitutional.

CJC's Bernie Farber

In the years that followed, the growth of the Internet provided Zundel with a new medium of expression and the Web site known as "zundelsite" soon achieved an international profile. A man handing out flyers on a street corner could only hope to reach a few hundred people a day. The Internet gave Zundel a "streetcorner" with unlimited pedestrian traffic.

It's ironic, then, that it was the Internet that handed Zundel his first significant legal defeat. A complaint brought forward in 1999 alleged that "zundelsite" contravened section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act in that it exposed members of the Jewish community to hatred and contempt. In hearing this case, the Human Rights tribunal for the first time asserted its authority over the Internet. Canadian Jewish Congress applied for and received intervenor status in these hearings and participated in the proceedings that lasted for more than three years. In January 2002, the tribunal ruled that specific elements of "zundelsite" were hateful, and ordered their removal. By then, Zundel had left Canada to take up residence in the United States.

And there the matter might have ended, but in March of 2003, Zundel was arrested by agents of the US Immigration Service. He was charged with overstaying his visitor's visa and deported to Canada.

Zundel immediately claimed refugee status, stating that he would be subjected to cruel and unusual punishment if he were to be returned to Germany. Hearings before the Immigration and Refugee Board to determine this matter were underway when the federal government signed a certificate in which it alleged that there were reasonable grounds to believe that Zundel posed a security threat to Canada.

Over the next two years, the Crown and a number of defense lawyers debated the matter before Justice Pierre Blais of the Federal Court of Canada. Through more than 40 days of hearings it became clear that Zundel was well connected to a rogue's gallery of racist and white supremacist leaders in Canada and internationally. Justice Blais did not believe that these connections and encounters were benign. In the end, Blais took Zundel at his word when he described himself as being a "guru of the right."

There is an old proverb which informs us that "truth is the daughter of time." In the case of Ernst Zundel, the truth has finally emerged for all to see.

Book highlights 'extraordinary ordinary' people

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Over the past several years, Paula Todd, co-host of TVOntario's Studio 2, has discovered what it means to be "an extraordinary ordinary person."

In her book A Quiet Courage: Inspiring Stories from All of Us, Todd wrote about 12 regular people who endured tragedy and triumphed from it.

Todd, who is also host and producer of the TVO biography program Person 2 Person with Paula Todd, was the guest speaker at Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's recent 11th annual Women For Women Breakfast, in support of WIZO services.

Paula Todd

In an interview prior to the breakfast, Todd said she was inspired to write the book after seeking interview subjects for her biography program.

"Our idea for the show was to interview ordinary people who were successful in their community. After doing about six interviews, I realized I had the wrong take on success. I was startled to discover that the key to triumph was often tragedy.

"I needed to change my way of thinking. I was collecting [interviews with] people who went through a forced emotional evolution, and they believed that this forced them into a place they couldn't have gotten to on their own."

When asked about their success, she said, "they spoke of failure and loss, and all pointed to a pivotal traumatic experience that transformed them into exceptional people.

"What nearly destroyed them sparked an emotional transformation that gave birth to their newer, stronger selves. Rather than seeing tragedy as their downfall, they embraced its lessons and spoke openly of its gifts."

Among the 12 people profiled in the book, which grew out of the interviews, were a teacher who endured torture in an Ethiopian prison, an award-winning chef who was paralyzed in a car accident, an artist whose husband and daughter were murdered, a doctor who hid his alcoholism for 30 years, and a veteran police officer who suffered from depression after investigating some of Canada's notorious murderers.

"These people turned my head around. They were a wake-up call. [They taught me] that life is precious. We live in a world in which we become upset if something fabulous doesn't happen, and we've lost touch with the fact that every moment is a precious gift."

Reading about what other people have lived through is an inspiration, Todd said. "It helps us see that people suffered and thrived. It gives us insight into how profound life can be.

"We don't need to go through any of these things to [learn] something. We can still carry away life's lessons."

Society prizes the easy, and hides the difficult, she said. "We've created the victim mentality. We see loss as diminishing, and it should be an opportunity to build strength of character."

Money raised during the WIZO services campaign benefits projects in Israel and Toronto. In Israel, projects include Nahalal Youth Village and Agricultural School, Hadassim Children and Youth Village, Mirial Small Youth Club, and the Rose Dunkelman Day Care Centre, as well as hotlines, shelters for battered women, a rape crisis centre, legal advice bureaus and information centres for women.

In Toronto, the campaign is linked to the North York Women's Shelter, Yellow Brick House, MicroSkills, and ASTEH – Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing.

Chabad holds worldwide Purim costume contest

The World's largest Purim costume contest has been launched.

Until one week after Purim, which takes place this year on March 25, children of all ages from around the world are invited to submit a photo of themselves modelling their disguises.

"This is the first time ever that a Purim contest is being held on such a grand scale," said Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, Spiritual Leader of Thornhill-based Chabad@Flamingo. It is being organized by the international Chabad-Lubavitch movement.

"We're getting entries from across the globe, and it's clear that the initiative is helping to heighten excitement for and anticipation of the holiday, while bringing the global Jewish community a little closer together," said Rabbi Kaplan.

Contestants can enter the world-wide contest by visiting www.chabadflamingo.com and following the instructions. Those interested can also vote on which costumes they think are most creative, with the final tally of "ballots" submitted by site visitors to be announced one week after the holiday.

Prizes include a $150 (US) shopping spree at Toys R Us for the winner and books, videos and computer games for runners-up.

Play reflects recent research on dementia

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

"I'm still here!" proclaims a member of the cast of a play by the same name, a dramatic yet heart-breakingly poignant depiction of the effects of dementia.

The play, written and directed by Vrenia Ivonoffsky, is based on research conducted by Christine Jonas-Simpson, director of nursing research at Sunnybrook/Women's College Hospital and Gail Mitchell, professor of nursing at York University.

Mitchell and Jonas-Simpson have studied how people cope with dementia, both in themselves and in a family member, for some 15 years. Some of the research, specifically into early onset dementia, was done via Internet.

Mitchell said that they wanted to give a voice to those affected, as well as to lessen the stigma associated with it.

""We wondered how we could best show our new understanding of patients and their families," Jonas-Simpson said. "Sunnybrook has put on plays about various problems, like cancer, so we thought that was an interesting approach."

The cast, all of whom have been touched by dementia, are from Ryerson University's Act II Studio, a theatre school and creative drama centre for adults over 50. It is part of the Seniors Education Program in Ryerson University's Continuing Education Division.

Funding is from the Collaborative Research Program – Long Term Care; Ken Murray and the Murray Alzheimer & Research Education Program, University of Waterloo; and Sunnybrook & Women's Research Institute.

Mary Fox, director of the Collaborative Research Program, explained that the program is a "practice-based knowledge exchange, a consortium of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care; Sunnybrook & Women's College Hospital; Toronto Rehabilitation Centre; and Bridgeport Health." It is based at Baycrest.

"We aim to develop knowledge to help people in the community, with researchers, clinicians and people in the community on an equal footing."

Cast all have been touched by disease

The consortium doesn't just fund research, though – it also funds the dissemination of knowledge. Which is how it got involved with I'm Still Here.

The play, Mitchell said, gets to the core of what it means to be human, which is probably why it has such a tremendous impact on those who see it.

The actors take different roles during the production, switching effortlessly from patient, to nurse, to friend, to mother and daughter, to husband and to commentator. Different scenes show the terror of realizing what is happening to the person with dementia and the hopeless feeling of getting the formal diagnosis. Friends are at a loss as to how to respond, especially as the condition worsens.

Family is also at a loss, seeing a loved one's personality changing as the skills they prided themselves on slip away.

When the person with dementia has to go to live in a nursing home, a whole new set of problems opens up. The sufferer can't understand why they are where they are, and wants to go home. The family has to advocate against uncaring staff.

One of the most moving themes in the play is the relationship between a mother and daughter. The tension and uncertainty of the early days after the diagnosis gives rise to a kind of resignation and comfort, as they sing songs together, and talk about old times. Much of the daughter's feelings come from a real diary of a woman chronicling the mental deterioration and eventual death of her mother, an Alzheimer's disease sufferer.

The title, I'm Still Here, comes from the painful reality that the people around someone suffering from dementia talk about them, rather than to them, ignore what they are saying, make assumptions about them, and simply don't take the time to really listen.

The eventual goal, if they can get the funding, is to take the play across the country. A dream of Jonas-Simpson, Mitchell and Fox is to find some way to film the play, so it is available for the general public and those working and dealing with dementia.

For more information, call Tammy Muskat at 416-785-2508, ext. 2557.

Syria's involvement in Lebanon not likely to end

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

What do we really know about what's going on in Lebanon? With most media reports focusing on the anti-Syrian rallies that followed the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri, one could assume that many, if not most, Lebanese want freedom from Syrian occupation – and freedom in the broader sense of democratic reform.

That assumption was contradicted last week, when the media reported on a huge pro-Syrian rally, orchestrated by Hezbollah.

The BBC's Orla Guerin (Newsworld, March 8) said of the estimated half-million people at the rally: "When Hezbollah calls, the people answer. Take a look at the group. The pro-Syrian camp coming out in massive numbers, just a few hundred metres from where the opposition gathered. Proof that the picture here isn't quite as neat as the outside world would want."

But camera-friendly pictures of anti- and pro-Syrian demonstrations show only part of the underlying reality. Often overlooked are the ways in which Syria will most likely continue to control Lebanon, no matter how many Syrian troops eventually leave.

Neither Guerin nor most of her colleagues have even touched on this story because they have failed to examine in any detail the various ways Syria has entrenched itself over the past decades into the fabric of Lebanese economic and political life.

Samuel Segev is one of the few journalists who are looking beyond the rallies to the bigger picture. In his Winnipeg Free Press column of March 8, "Assad splits Lebanese opposition," Segev wrote about "the fate of the 5,000-strong Syrian intelligence machine that runs a 'Syrian state within the Lebanese state.'"

These intelligence agents matter far more than conscripted soldiers. In a telephone conversation, Jim Lederman, senior Israel analyst for Oxford Analytica, an international institution that draws on various experts to provide analysis of international events, said about 500 of these agents have absolute control and will remain in Lebanon. Unlike military troops, whose movement can be monitored, plain-clothed intelligence officers cannot easily be tracked.

Segev is also one of the few journalists to draw attention to Syria's support of Iran's involvement in Lebanon: "Syria allowed Iran to ship via Damascus airport medium-range rockets, mortars, and recently also Iranian-made reconnaissance drones that can be fitted with explosives. A unit of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard is stationed [in Lebanon] in the Beka'a Valley. It includes a medical team so that wounded Hezbollah terrorists are not treated in civilian hospitals but in clinics run by the Iranian group."

Then there are the approximately one million Syrian workers in Lebanon who, along with the intelligence apparatus, contribute substantially to Syria's otherwise extremely weak economy by sending money and goods back home.

On March 5, Israel's deputy prime minister Shimon Peres remarked that Syria's occupation of Lebanon is economic as well as military. He said 20 per cent of Syria's economy comes from Lebanon. That figure may be low, but it underscores just how desperate Syria is to maintain its stake in Lebanon. Syria's very survival depends on it.

Lederman remarked: "No matter what happens, no matter how many troops and intelligence agents are withdrawn, Syria will remain in control of the Lebanese economy. And because it is in control of the Lebanese economy, it will continue to control the Lebanese political system."

He continued: "The Syrian economy is so antiquated and in such shambles that the Assad regime could not afford the payoffs it needs to survive if it cannot continue to siphon off money and goods among countless other things from the Lebanese economy."

You can find more detailed analysis of this situation at Lederman's blog: www.jimlederman.com.

BUILDING HOUSES: Bialik Hebrew Day School has adopted a house system for its senior division students in grades 6 to 8. Its the first Jewish day school in the city to do so. The aim is to enhance school spirit and promote healthy competition across the grades, as well as to develop leadership skills among older children, who become role models for their younger counterparts. The house system has its roots in British educational culture and was recently re-popularized in the Harry Potter series of books and movies. Each Bialik student is assigned to one of four houses, which are named after universities in Israel that represent major cities and/or geographic regions: Bar Ilan/Tel Aviv University; Hebrew University of Jerusalem; Haifa University/Technion; and Ben Gurion/Weizmann. Pictured are house captains and vice-captains.

'Israel' removed from passports

Kingsbury pointed out that passports listing the bearer's birthplace as "Jerusalem, Palestine" will be recalled as well.

Canadians born in Jerusalem will have only the city name listed as their birthplace in their passports, Kingsbury said.

Asked if it is illegal to carry a Canadian passport with the notation "Jerusalem, Israel," Kingsbury said, "An administrative error was made. We're moving to rectify this error."

The issue surfaced last January when Eliyahu Yehoshua Veffer, a 17-year-old Torontonian born in Jerusalem, filed a lawsuit, with the aid of B'nai Brith Canada, seeking a judicial review of the policy.

Veffer, a Grade 11 student at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto whose father is Rabbi Shmuel Veffer, spiritual leader of the Village Shul, was brought to Canada by his parents six years ago. He's a citizen of both Canada and Israel, and has an Israeli passport.

Veffer said Canada's refusal to recognize Israel as his birthplace is insulting.

In response to the decision taken by the federal government, Shimon Fogel, chief executive officer of the Canada-Israel Committee, issued a statement from Israel.

"Jerusalem is Israel's capital. Its centrality to the national, political and religious identity of the Jewish people has never rested on the agreement or validation of the international community.

"The CIC nevertheless understands the significance of Jerusalem within the context of Middle East peace negotiations. In that regard, it must be recognized that the final disposition of the Jerusalem question can only be resolved through the process of direct, bilateral negotiations involving Israel and the Palestinian Authority, as prescribed in the internationally endorsed 'road map' [peace plan].

"Even then, any viable negotiations must acknowledge, respect and incorporate Israel and the Jewish people's unique attachment to the entire city of Jerusalem, along with Israel's efforts since reunification in June 1967 to guarantee freedom of religious practice to the city's diverse faith communities.

"The CIC encourages Canada to reflect this fundamental reality in all aspects of its Middle East policy."

Incident in Israel highlights peace issue for students

By JONAH BROTMAN
Special to The CJN

The recent election of Mahmoud Abbas as Palestinian Authority President signalled a new era for the Palestinian people and the possibility for lasting peace with Israel. After the ceasefire discussions at Sharm el-Sheikh, even the international media appear to be hopeful about the shifting dynamics.

Guest Voice

However, on the heels of this new wave of optimism for peace lurks the strong undertow of a lived reality. This reality is one in which confrontation is a fact of daily life for two peoples.

The enormous chasm was demonstrated to me on a recent trip to Israel. While we were on our way to visit a friend's house in Jaffa – which has an Arab-Israeli majority – the large group of North American Jewish university students that I was with encountered a smaller group of Arab-Israeli street kids.

After most of our group had passed them, one of the Arab-Israeli kids began yelling at one of us.

Within a moment, the situation escalated. The street kid claimed that a rock had been thrown at him. Suddenly he lunged at my friend with a hand knife, holding it up to my friend's stomach.

Instantly there was chaos: yelling, pushing and some scuffling. Our Israeli counsellor, along with some other Israeli adults, quickly dealt with the kids by first, asking the kids to leave, and eventually pushing some of the kids and yelling at them until they ran away. That desolate residential street in Jaffa had become the battleground between two fighting nations, two sworn enemies, only to return to its shadowy tranquillity within five minutes.

Many members of our group were shaken by the incident. Some nervously recollected how close they had been to injury or even death, while others were simply shocked. Some seemed unfazed – possibly like the post-suicide bombing feelings of desensitized emptiness.

But most importantly, all of us were shocked by the palpable anger and hatred that was evident in those children. The prospect for peace and the election of Mahmoud Abbas held no meaning for them at that moment. The grandeur of a stable infrastructure and an improved quality of life was all too distant. The situation, as it has existed during their lives and for many years before, has nurtured these children. Born into a world of hatred, they have developed the inclination to become filled with hate.

Whether the international community realizes it or not, any government effort at change is superficial until it affects the reality on the ground. Those kids we met, who have been taught to hate, need to unlearn that teaching. The poisoned states of mind that exist on both sides need to be healed before a lasting change can occur. And only then can the optimistic wave of peace become a sustainable tide of reality.

ISRAEL WEEK IN GUELPH: The Israeli Affairs Committee (IAC) at the University of Guelph put on its second-annual Israel Week – an apolitical celebration of all things Israeli, the week of March 7-11. There were eight tables with 17 display boards and plenty of pamphlets and free Israeli food. A mock "Kotel" (Western Wall) was constructed and passers-by were invited to write messages of peace. Members of the executive of the IAC were present each day at the booths to welcome people and field any questions. Here, Esther Mendelsohn and a visitor to the displays talk about diversity and democracy in Israel and the people's desire for peace.

Karla Goldberg's art

Artist overcomes effect of stroke

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Although it usually doesn't host art exhibitions, the Baycrest Geriatric Centre has made a rare exception in the case of Karla Goldberg, an 84-year-old Toronto artist who trained herself to make art with her left hand after a stroke paralyzed the right side of her body two years ago.

The exhibition "Creative Strokes of the Brush: Karla Goldberg and Her Artistic Journey Post-Stroke," which consists of about 40 paintings and needleworks from both before and after her medical calamity, went on view in the Baycrest main lobby last week and remains on display until March 27.

Arranged chronologically, Goldberg's post-stroke paintings highlight her inspirational artistic progression.

The sombre colours, simple lines and limited complexity of the early works give way to the increasing colour intensity, depth and sophistication of the later pieces as the artist acquired significant fine motor control of her left, formerly non-dominant hand, and regained some of the visual-spatial perceptual acuity she had lost.

In one of her earliest post-stroke creations, Goldberg drew a squiggly line to convey her sense of mental confusion. Later she realized she had it backward and made a second painting with the squiggly line – representing a question mark – now facing in the right direction.

Although she has found it hard to resume her needlepoint – "It's difficult to thread the needle and to get it down and up again with one hand," she explained – she was determined to finish the last piece she was working on before the stroke.

A needlepoint of a female face had lain unfinished in her home studio for nearly two years. Last autumn, she returned to it with a vengeance and worked on it for three days, non-stop, until it was done.

Today, she concentrates mostly on acrylic paintings: she twists open tubes of paint by catching their caps in a drawer.

"I can paint, thank God," she said during an interview in her midtown Toronto home, which is graced with sculptures, tapestries, hooked rugs, ceramics, paintings, macrame, candlesticks and other evidence of a bounteous talent.

Her post-stroke pieces seem to rise fully to the quality of her previous work even as they convey the message, "If there's a will, there's a way."

Born in Germany in 1920, the former Karla Baer fled Germany with her family after Kristallnacht in November 1938 and was interred with her mother in Gurs, a concentration camp in the French Pyrenees. In 1947, her family was reunited in Paris and she married David Goldberg, a Canadian ex-serviceman working in Europe with the Joint Distribution Committee. The couple settled in Toronto in 1948 and had sons Marty, Gary and Robby.

"It's appropriate for this show to be at the Baycrest because it can give an incentive to others who have had a stroke," said David Goldberg.

Karla Goldberg does not sell her work and has never seriously contemplated a commercial exhibition. She has designed ark curtains for Toronto-area synagogues Shaar Shalom, Beth Tzedec and Beth Torah, as well as a menorah weaving for the Ohel Moishe Synagogue in Shanghai, China. Another of her pieces hangs in the office of a member of the Israeli Knesset; many others are found in the homes of friends and family members.

Comic and tragic masks are a recurring theme in her work; so are clowns, whose stylized faces are often represented in her colourful, semi-abstract designs.

"I like clowns. I think we all are clowns," she said. "I have a lot of sympathy for them. They can be desperate, but they make people laugh. Ridiculous as they look sometimes, there's a human face behind the clown face."

Goldberg's art remains on view in the Silverman Garden Court in the main lobby of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care through March 27.

Gerald Gladstone ז"ל Died peacefully at St. Michael's Hospital on March 7, 2005 at the age of 76 after a very courageous battle against cancer. Loved and cherished by his children, Allycia (Peter), Stephen (Carmella), Seana (Gordon), Lawrence, Angela, and Brant (Jackie), and step-daughter Lisa, his second wife Lorraine, his grandchildren Krysten, Anthony, Aaron, Lara, Jennifer, Gemma, and Alexa, his sister Rose (Louis), his brothers Henry, Irving (Lillian), David (Jacqueline), Joseph (Elisabeth) and Leonard (Nicole), and his many friends. He is predeceased by his parents Dora and Ralph and his brothers Russell and Benny. He is remembered fondly by his first wife, Sheila McCusker.

Gerald was one of Canada's premier artists. Born and raised in Toronto, Gerald, for over 50 years, painted and welded a vast variety of paintings and sculptures that were shown in galleries around the world. He is represented in many major private and public collections.

He created many public works of art for cities across Canada and internationally. One of his largest sculptures, "Universal Man", originally created for and displayed at the CN Tower, is currently installed at the Yorkdale Shopping Centre in Toronto.

A major public fountain, "The Three Graces," commissioned by the Ontario government, stands in front of the Mowat Block at Bay and Wellesley streets in Toronto. His "Reclining Female," commissioned by the Royal Bank of Canada, adorns the upper terrace of Place Ville Marie in Montreal.

Gerald will be greatly missed by his family and friends. His art, humour, sound advice, and his discussions related to art and music are a legacy that continues to enrich us all.

The family would like to thank sincerely the staff of St. Michael's and Princess Margaret Hospitals for all the wonderful care and attention they gave Gerald. It is the family's wish that any donations in appreciation of Gerry's life and work be made to either of those institutions.

A memorial reception will be held at a later time and place to be announced.

ה'רב שימשון הייליק

Harav Shimshon Heilik, husband, father, grandfather, teacher, artist, scholar and author passed away peacefully on March 5, 2005 with his family by his side. Predeceased by his wife Ida in 2000, he is survived by his children James (Bronia), Jacob (Sharron), Geela Blitt (Morris), Don (Riki), and Esther Amir (Danny): His grandchildren Dena, Judy, Joshua (son of Dorothy), Judd, Jonathan, Uri, Talia (Casey), Lisa, Natalie, Matan and Yoav; as well as his special friend Esther Krygier.

Born in 1917 in Baranow, Poland into a household with strong traditions, wealthy in spiritual values and learning, he studied at several yeshivot, including that of the Chofetz Chaim in Radom where he received smicha. When drafted to the Polish cavalry in 1938 he left for Paris, leaving behind his father, Rabbi Yakov Heilik, his mother Geela and siblings Sarah Gitel, Naftali, Pinchas, Dan and Hershl, all of whom perished in the Holocaust. Aided by an uncle, he got a Bolivian visa, landed in Lima, Peru, joined an anthropological expedition and wandered through the South American jungles, eventually ending up in Buenos Aires where he found work in a factory. He soon moved on to a teaching position in the Yiddish town of Mosesville Argentina. There, he met Ida, his wife of almost 60 years. The majority of his working career was spent in the classrooms of the I.L. Peretz Schools of Calgary and Winnipeg.

Shimshon Heilik was multifaceted and will be remembered differently by those who knew him. To many, he was Lerer Heilik, teaching several generations in some families. His many students have spread throughout the world and still regard him with affection and respect, remembering his fairness, firm discipline and depth of knowledge. To others, he was Shimshon Heilik the artist. Painting was a hobby second to his teaching. He studied at the Banff School of Fine Art and counted among his teachers A.Y. Jackson of the Group of Seven. His work can be found in all corners of the globe. He wrote about history, ethics, and philosophy. His books are in major research libraries in Canada, the US and Israel. Using the pen name Shaked, he wrote for various Yiddish periodicals. Some of his books were also used in the schools where he taught. Above all, he was a deeply committed Yidishist who loved all things Jewish, even what he called some of its narishkeit. He never tired of recounting stories of historical, literary or Biblical events and trends, as well as stories drawn from his own life experiences.

He invested himself in his family, colleagues and students and his legacy lives on as they contribute to their communities, their countries and future generations.

LITOVITZ, Terry ז"ל It is with great sadness that we announce the passing of Terry Litovitz. Beloved wife of the late Howie, cherished mother of Aviva and Felicia, dear sister of Barbara and Jeff, and Bernard and Stephen. Sister-in-law of Geraldine and Lou, and devoted friend and teacher of many.

The funeral services were held on Tuesday March 8th at 2 pm at Steeles Memorial Chapel. Interment was at the Beth Lida section of the Mount Sinai Cemetery. Memorial donations can be made to the Canadian Cancer Society (1-888-939-3333) or to the Terry Litovitz Merit Award in Management at the University of Toronto (Michelle Coutinho 416-287-7083).

STARK, Claude Benjamin passed away peacefully on March 4, 2005. Cherished son of the late Milton and Isabel Stark. Also survived by devoted sister Judie Stark. Claude was a special and adored uncle and great-uncle. Also leaves a brother Marvin Stark.

Donations to The Reena Foundation 905-763-8254 ext. 3034, would be appreciated.

Photographer wins Governor-General's award

Presented in the field of visual and media arts

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Montreal photographer Lynne Cohen is one of the winners of the sixth annual Governor-General's Awards in visual and media arts, sponsored by the Canada Council for the Arts.

Cohen, born in Racine, Wis., has lived in Canada since 1973. Now 60, she acquired Canadian citizenship in 1979.

Originally a sculptor and printmaker, she turned to photography in the early 1970s.

Cohen, whose works have been exhibited in Canada, the United States and Europe, specializes in indoor photography.

Lynne Cohen

Her subjects range from halls, beauty salons, living rooms and lobbies to classrooms, spas, military installations and training environments.

"My work has always been about psychological, sociological, intellectual and political artifice," she said.

"This is apparent in my early pictures, but in recent years it is clearer still. I am now more preoccupied by deception, claustrophobia, manipulation and control. I take my work to be social and political, but there is no concrete message."

Armed with a large format view camera, Cohen looks for subjects that strike her as strange and/or beautiful.

Asked if she has ever chosen Jewish topics, she replied, "I'm an internationalist in every sense of the word."

Cohen, who is intrigued by architectural details and hardware, moved to photography out of a need to create art that is more social and political.

Above all, she explained in an interview last week, she regarded photography as an outlet to the real world and a way out of the isolation of a studio.

"I came to photography with intellectual baggage from sculpture and contemporary art history," said Cohen, who studied at the Slade School of Art in London, the Ox-Bow Summer School of Painting in Michigan and the University of Michigan.

"There are uncanny affinities between what I photograph and what artists paint and construct. In my work you will find Kosuth clocks, Van Eyck mirrors, Beuys blackboards, Artschwanger desks, Hatoum wire cages and many other reminders of early and contemporary art."

Influenced by such currents as minimalism, conceptualism and pop art, Cohen works mainly in North America and western Europe.

Her photographs have appeared in the National Gallery of Canada, the Australian National Gallery, the Bibliotheque nationale de France, the Art Institute of Chicago, the Metropolitan Museum of Art in Manhattan.

She is the author of several books, including Lost and Found and Occupied Territory, and currently, she is finishing a book titled Camouflage, which she describes as "a continuation of what I'm doing."

Cohen has taught at the University of Ottawa, Ryerson University, the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design, the Ecole des Beaux-arts de Bordeaux and Eastern Michigan University.

Asked why she left the United States, she replied, "It was time for a move. I would have come here earlier had I been able to."

Cohen received her award at a ceremony at Rideau Hall in Ottawa on March 16.

In a press release, Gov.Gen. Adrienne Clarkson said, "These exceptional individuals have matched their extraordinary talent and artistic vision with the perseverance necessary to succeed in a country as vast and diverse as Canada.

"Working in many disciplines and with a variety of media, they have created impressive bodies of work that help define who we are as Canadians and what we stand for as a society."

The other winners were: Carl Beam, Roland Poulin, Francoise Sullivan, Paul Wong and the partnership of Lisa Steele and Kim Tomczak.

Montreal Jews join St. Patrick's parade

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – For the first time in its 181-year history, Montreal's St. Patrick's Day Parade had a Jewish presence.

This past Sunday, a Jewish community float, presided over by Jeff Boro, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC,QR), wended its way along the the Ste. Catherine Street route, from Fort to Jeanne Mance streets.

"This is part of Jeff's commitment to the Jewish community to be more visible in Quebec life. The community has been thought of as insular, and it wants to participate more actively," said Rebecca Rosenberg, CJCs' acting regional executive director.

When Boro became regional president last year, he promised in his inaugural address that outreach to the broader society would be a priority. In the audience that night was his friend and fellow lawyer, Richard McConomy, a prominent member of the Irish community.

For many years, Boro has attended the Irishman of the Year Breakfast that precedes the parade, and he and McConomy decided it was time the Jewish community officially joined the St. Patrick's day festivities.

The community's float was a flat-bed truck carrying a large menorah and a banner in English and French saying, "Greetings from the Jewish Community." Around its perimeter, there was a banner with "Hello" written in a multitude of languages, including Arabic, representing Jews' many countries of origin.

Along the way, as DJ played different types of Jewish folk music, such as klezmer, Sephardi and Israeli.

Jewish students from Hillel; AEPi, the Jewish fraternity at McGill, and the Jewish Law Students Association at the Université de Montreal, sang and danced beside the float, dressed in special blue-and-white T-shirts with a menorah.

The Montreal parade is the oldest and longest running St. Patrick's Day parade in North America, and is said to rival even that of Dublin. Ten of thousands line the parade route every year.

CJC plans to have a float, also for the first time, in June's St. Jean Baptiste parade, if it is held. (It was cancelled last year.)

Purim Food Ideas

Large hamantaschen to represent Haman's hat

By LISA SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

In Purim the Jew laughs. So reads the first sentence of the Purim chapter in my 50-year old reference book, A Treasury of Jewish Holidays, by Simon E. Goldfin. Above these words is a wonderful pen and ink illustration of boys in black pants, donning taunting masks, weaving in between girls wearing swirling dresses and trickster masks of their own.

At the small but spirited synagogue my daughter and I belonged to in California, Purim was just such a day. There was the raucous service where, when Haman was mentioned, loud graggers erased the syllables of his name. It was followed by a home-style carnival my daughter and her friend never tired of attending. As I watched the rabbi dance in a ballet tutu and the chicken-costumed cantor getting dunked in the sponge toss, I knew my daughter would be well entertained between running from game to game, trying to win enough tickets for one of the coveted disco lights at the prize table.

I wandered downstairs and away from the noise to the brimming dessert table where trays of delicious homemade and bakery bought treats were being sold. One larger than life hamantasch caught my eye. It was four times the usual cookie-sized triangle and at least twice as thick, and it was the only one left. So I quickly paid my $1.25 and walked away with a two-fisted pastry.

It was so hefty, that it was tempting and funny looking all at once, in the way oversized foods often are. But the taste was pure delight. Because, as I broke off one rustic pastry corner after another, working my way slowly toward the jam-filled centre, my afternoon wandering through the carnival, watching my daughter play, counting her ever growing stack of winning tickets, got sweeter and sweeter, knowing I would still have more than enough of my giant hamantasch to share with her on our tired walk home.

HAT-SIZED HAMANTASCHEN

The three-cornered hamantasch is meant to symbolize Haman's hat, and this over-sized version comes close. You can make them all larger size or add a few smaller ones to the platter, just for the fun of comparison! Also, I like to make the dough and fruit jams one day ahead, so the filling and shaping of the pastries can be mostly play.

Dough:
1 cup butter (or margarine)
1 cup sugar
4 large eggs
4 cups flour
1 tsp. almond flavoring
1 tsp. vanilla flavoring
4 tsp. baking powder

Filling:
1 cup raisins (or dried apricots, dates, or favourite fruit)
1 tsp. fresh lemon juice
4 tbsp. hot water
¼ sliced almonds (or pecans, walnuts) (optional)

Or

jar of favourite jam can of poppy or prune filling
1 cup light and dark chocolate morsels

Note: You will need at least two of these options (ie. a dried fruit filling plus one more) to fill the dough.

Dough:

In medium bowl, combine flour and baking powder. Set aside.

In large bowl of electric mixer with paddle attachment, cream butter and sugar until light and fluffy. Add eggs and flavourings and mix well. With mixer set to low, slowly add flour until sticky batter forms. Shape dough into disc, and seal completely in plastic wrap. Refrigerate for three hours or overnight.

Filling:

You can fill your hamantaschen with anything you like. For a dried fruit filling, try the indicated proportions and alter to your tastes. The raisin recipe below is enough to fill three large hamantaschen so you will need one extra alternative.

In a food processor with blade attachment, add raisins and water and allow to soak for a few minutes. Add lemon juice and nuts (optional) and pulse until jam-like consistency.

Repeat steps for another dried fruit filling or use your favourite jam or chocolates as a filling.

Preparation: Preheat oven to 375. Lightly butter cookie sheet or spray with vegetable oil.

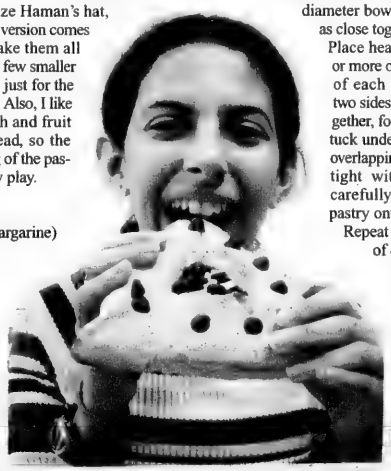
Divide dough in half. Put half back in refrigerator, wrapped in plastic, to keep cold.

On a lightly floured surface with a lightly floured rolling pin, roll dough to one-quarter inch thickness. Using a seven inch diameter bowl rim, cut circles as close together as possible. Place heaping tablespoon or more of filling in centre of each circle. Fold top two sides of each circle together, fold up lower edge, tuck under top two edges, overlapping seams, sealing tight with fingers, and carefully lifting each pastry onto cookie sheet.

Repeat with second half of dough.

Bake 15-20 minutes or until golden brown. Do not over bake.

Remove from tray and cool on wire rack. Makes 6-7 large or 5 large and 7 small hamantaschen.



Enjoy the only traditional Purim food

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Although it is traditional to have a Purim seudah, there are no specific traditions regarding the food, as there are on other holidays. Some people serve a long coiled challah or an especially long braided one to symbolize the rope that was used to hang Haman; some serve turkey as a symbol of King Achashverosh, whose kingdom stretched from India (Hodu, or Turkey, in Hebrew) to Ethiopia; and some serve a vegetarian meal such as Esther might have eaten, since she ate only vegetarian foods in the king's palace in order to maintain kashrut.

Kreplach are another food often eaten at the seudah to symbolize Haman's three-cornered hat. But whatever type of menu is served, the one traditional food of Purim is the hamantasch.

Part of the Purim atmosphere in Israel includes seeing children and adults in costume, walking through the neighbourhood giving baskets and plates filled with hamantaschen and other goodies to family, friends and neighbours. Purim is a major event, with most business closed, and even the bus drivers dress in costume.

Since no celebration of Purim would be complete without delicious baked goods and other sweets, diets are on hold for most people. I try to be very selective about the goodies I eat and not overdo it but it's very difficult.

Norene Gilletz's recipe for phyllo hamantaschen from MealLeaniYumm! makes an excellent guilt-free alternative to cookie dough hamantaschen. It's very low in both fat and calories.

PHYLLO HAMANTASCHEN

4 egg whites
½ of an egg yolk
12 sheets of phyllo dough icing sugar, optional
five-fruit filling

Line a cookie sheet with aluminum foil and spray it with non-stick spray. In a mixing bowl, blend egg whites with egg yolk. Place one sheet of phyllo dough on a dry work surface so that longer edge of dough is parallel to edge of counter. Brush lightly with egg glaze. Cover with a second sheet of dough and brush with egg glaze. (Keep remaining dough covered with plastic wrap to prevent it from drying out.) Cut dough into 6 strips. Place a rounded spoonful of filling 1 inch from the bottom of each strip. Fold dough upwards once so that filling is covered.

Fold the dough like the flag. First, bring the right bottom corner of dough upwards diagonally to meet the left edge, making a triangle. Continue folding upwards and from side to side until the strip is completely folded. Place triangles seam-side-down on prepared baking sheet. Brush lightly with egg glaze. Repeat with remaining dough and filling. (Hamantaschen may be either baked or frozen at this point. Cover tightly and freeze. They do not need to be thawed before baking.) Bake in a preheated oven at 375 for about 18-20 minutes until golden. When completely cool, sprinkle lightly with icing sugar, if desired. These freeze well. Makes 36.

Five Fruit Filling
1 medium seedless orange (thin-skinned)
1 cup raisins
1 cup pitted dates
1 cup pitted prunes
1 cup dried apricots

Cut orange into chunks, but do not peel. Cut away both the navel and the stem end. In the processor, process orange until finely ground, about 20 seconds. Add remaining ingredients and process until finely ground, about 15-20 seconds. Scrape down sides of bowl as necessary. Makes about 3 cups.

CHERRY HAMANTASCHEN

Although I have to admit that I haven't yet tried this recipe myself at the time of writing, it comes from a friend whose judgment I trust and who assures me that this is the ultimate in hamantaschen. It's the one I'm going to make this year. She told me the recipe originally came from someone whose father was a professional baker. If the dough gets too sticky while you're working with it, refrigerate it for a while. These can be frozen in carefully sealed containers until you're ready to use them.

½ cup margarine, softened
½ cup sugar
1 egg
1 tsp. grated lemon rind or a squirt of lemon juice
1 tsp. vanilla
2½ cups flour
½ tsp. salt
few drops water
1 can cherry pie filling or good quality morello cherry jam
sugar for sprinkling

Cream margarine and sugar together in mixer until light and fluffy. Beat in egg, lemon peel and vanilla. Add flour and salt. Beat in water, a few drops at a time, until dough starts to come away from the sides of the bowl.

Form dough into a flat disk and wrap in plastic wrap or place in a large plastic bag. Refrigerate for a minimum of 2-3 hours and maximum of 2-3 days.

When ready to bake, roll out dough flat about ⅛-in. thickness on a lightly floured surface. Using a round cookie cutter or the top of a glass, cut out circles. Spoon 2 cherries and a little bit of filling onto the dough circles. Fold into hamantaschen shape.

If you've never done this before, to shape use both thumbs and the two first fingers on each hand. Slide two fingers from left hand under left side and two fingers from right hand under right side and two thumbs under the bottom of circle. Bring all fingers (with dough) together to form a triangle and try to pinch close. Repeat this process with remaining circles and dough.

Place hamantaschen on a cookie sheet lined with baking paper. Sprinkle a small amount of sugar on top of each one. Bake at 350 for 12-15 minutes or till just starting to brown. Makes about 36.

CHOCOLATE HAMANTASCHEN FILLING

This comes from the same friend who gave me the above recipe.

8 oz. semisweet chocolate
6 oz. unsweetened chocolate
6 tbsp. margarine
⅔ cup flour
1 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
2 eggs
2 tsp. vanilla extract
1 tbsp. instant coffee
¾ cup sugar
½ cup white chocolate chips
⅔ cup chopped pecans, almonds or walnuts, optional

In a microwave-proof bowl melt the semisweet chocolate and the unsweetened chocolate together. Mix in all the margarine, flour, baking powder, salt, eggs, vanilla, coffee and sugar. Mix to combine and then fold in the chocolate chips and nuts.

The extra filling (if any) may be made into chocolate brownie drop cookies. Makes enough to fill 36 hamantashen.

Sweets for your mishloach manot basket

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Purim is literally the sweetest holiday of the year. It's the one day on the calendar when Jewish fressers of the world delight in eating sweets with abandon.

On Purim, we forget about South Beach and Atkins. We don't count calories or carbs or points or worry about spikes in blood sugar and insulin surges. Feasting on baked goodies and other treats is part of the festivities.

It's customary to celebrate by noshing on a hamantasch for starters. The three-sided cookies filled with prune or poppy seeds – the traditional Ashkenazi Purim fare – still have a place of honour on mishloach manot platters, but there are usually plenty of other tasty morsels to choose from.

If you're thinking of giving home-made mishloach manot, consider including some squares and bars for variety. They're typically baked in a single pan so they're easy to make. They can be cut into small pieces, which makes them ideal treats for the holiday platters. Cookies can also be added for colour and shape.

One cookbook, The 500 Best Cookies Bars and Squares by baking maven, Ester Brody, (Robert Rose, 2003) offers plenty of simple recipes to choose from. Since 1998, Brody, a Calgary-based grandmother, has written a baking book a year, all published by Robert Rose. To date she has sold more than 100,000 books.

Her most recent offering – The 250 Best Cobblers, Custards, Cupcakes, Bread Puddings and More – has been on the shelves since September.

The following recipes are sweet treats that would be ideal for a mishloach manot platter. They all come from The 500 Best Cookies Bars and Squares.

CHOCOLATE CHIP BLONDIES

2 cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
2/3 cup butter, softened
2 cups of brown sugar, packed
2 eggs
1 cup of semi-sweet chocolate chips
1 cup of peanut-butter chips
1/2 walnuts, coarsely chopped
1/2 cup pecans, coarsely chopped

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 13x9-in. cake pan. In a bowl, mix together flour, baking powder and salt. In another bowl beat butter and brown sugar until smooth and creamy. Add eggs, one at a time, beating until incorporated. Stir in vanilla. Blend in flour mixture. Stir in chocolate and peanut butter chips and nuts.

Spread batter evenly in prepared pan. Bake in preheated oven for 30 to 35 minutes or until golden brown. Immediately place pan on a rack to cool completely. Then cut into squares. Makes 30 squares.

COFFEE MOCHA BROWNIES

3 squares (each 1 oz.) unsweetened chocolate
1/2 cup butter
2 tsp. instant espresso or coffee powder
1 1/4 cups granulated sugar
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla extract
2/3 cup all-purpose flour
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 cup bittersweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
1/2 cup pecans, chopped and toasted

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease 9-in. square cake pan

In a large saucepan over low heat, melt chocolate, butter and coffee, stirring constantly until mixture is smooth and coffee is dissolved. Set aside to cool slightly.

When chocolate has cooled, stir in sugar. Add eggs and vanilla and mix until blended. Blend in flour and salt. Stir in bittersweet chocolate and pecans.

Spread batter evenly in prepared pan. Bake in preheated oven for 30 to 35 minutes or until a tester inserted in the centre comes out almost clean. but with some moist crumbs. Immediately place pan on a rack to cool completely. Then cut into squares. Makes 24 brownies.

BETTY'S CORNFLAKE MACAROONS

2 egg whites
1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
1 cup of brown or granulated sugar
2 cups cornflakes, crushed
1/2 cup nuts, chopped
1 cup of shredded coconut

Preheat oven to 350F. Prepare a well-greased cookie sheet

Beat egg whites and vanilla until soft peaks form. Gradually beat in sugar so that egg white peaks remain stiff. Gently fold in cornflakes, nuts and coconut.

Drop by rounded teaspoons about 2 inches apart onto prepared cookie sheet. Bake in preheated oven 15 to 20 minutes or until delicately brown. Immediately transfer to wire racks to cool. Makes about 2 1/2 dozen.

OATMEAL LACE PENNIES

1 cup old-fashioned rolled oats
1 cup granulated sugar
3 tbsp. all-purpose flour
1/4 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 cup butter, melted
1 egg, beaten
1/2 tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 350F. Prepare a cookie sheet lined with foil, bright side up.

In a bowl, mix together oats, sugar, flour, baking powder and salt. In another bowl, beat egg, butter and vanilla. Add flour mixture and mix well. (If dough seems too soft, chill 15 to 20 minutes to firm.)

Drop by rounded teaspoons about 2 inches apart onto prepared cookie sheet. Bake in preheated oven for 8 to 10 minutes. Cool for 2 minutes on foil. Then transfer to wire racks to cool completely. Makes 5 1/2 dozen.

Wine-tasting techniques

On the Purim table sits a glass of fine wine and you're just about to drink it.

To begin, when pouring a glass of wine, always tilt the glass slightly away from you to prevent any drops from touching you or the table. To prevent the heat from your palm affecting the wine's temperature, always hold the glass by the stem. White wine should always be served chilled, but as for red, word now has it that red can also be chilled but for only an hour before serving. Always check the label to be sure that your wine choices complement your menu.

The aroma that results from the wine-making process is called the bouquet. Swirl the wine in your glass a few times, holding it about one inch from your nose. With your mouth slightly open, take a deep sniff. Ahhhhh!

To truly appreciate the wine's appearance, hold the glass up to the light examining it for colour. Then hold the glass up to a candle and judge its intensity and clarity.

Now relax. Take a full sip. Let the wine rest in your mouth for a few seconds and then swallow. If your wine doesn't linger or make an impression after swallowing, it's called short. And if your wine holds back on its aromas or flavours, it's called stingy. But if it has richness, strength and sweetness (dry, medium or sweet), body (light, medium or full), mellowness and more, you've chosen a winner that according to wine terminology has personality.

And here are some new wines that definitely have personality.

• White Zinfandel, from Baron Herzog, California, is the winner of gold medals at the New World International Wine Competition and the Orange County Fair. It is semi-dry with a crisp texture and has aromas of apple, strawberry and cotton candy. Best with full-flavoured fish, cheese, pizza and chicken.

• Chenin Blanc won gold medals at the Riverside International Wine Competition and at the Orange County Fair. Focused and crisp, with intense passion fruit and citrus flavours, it finishes with a touch of sweetness. Best with full- flavoured fish and Chinese food.

• Syrah has distinct berry and blackberry fruit notes, highlighted by subtle oak for intriguing complexity. Best with cheese and spicy chicken.

• Cabernet Sauvignon 2003, from the Eshkol Winery in South Africa, is winner of four medals, including a gold medal from the Tasters Guild International Wine Competition. It has a leafy, minty elegance with firm tannins tailored for the table. Dry finish with a long, lingering aftertaste. Food suggestions include beef, lamb and chicken.

• Shiraz 2003 has a sweet vanilla aroma and a hint of intense young-berry fruit. Spice rather than berry dominated. Sumptuous feel in the mouth, with great length. Its hallmark is dry but not lean tannins. Food suggestions include barbecued and marinated beef.

• Merlot 2003 has clean fruited aromas and is boosted by ripe fruit, a hallmark of this label. Best with gourmet hamburgers, beef and lamb.

All wines available at the LCBO.

Axworthy calls for UN reform

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The elimination of the veto at the United Nations would be a major step toward making the world body more effective, said former foreign minister Lloyd Axworthy.

"Only with the elimination of the veto will the UN be able to operate under the rule of law," he told a multifaith audience gathered at Congregation Etz Chayim for a discussion dedicated to the question of the moral response of faith communities toward world atrocities.

The evening arose out of Etz Chayim Rabbi Henry Balser's concern about the steadily deteriorating situation in the Darfur region in western Sudan.

"We learned during the Holocaust how easy it is to remain silent. The world remained silent during the killing in Cambodia in the 1970s and in Rwanda in the 1990s. And now Darfur.

"Why isn't anybody doing anything? We can't stand by while our neighbours are being murdered. We have a moral responsibility to act."

Following up on the rabbi's challenge, the synagogue's social action committee invited a Sudanese refugee to talk about his experiences.

In illustrating the moral dilemmas involved in deciding when it is right to intervene in the internal affairs of another country, Axworthy recalled the situation in the Serbian province of Kosovo in 1999.

"As Canada's foreign minister, I tried to espouse the concept of human security as compared to national security.

"I believe that the international community must be able to intervene to protect people from their own governments where absolutely necessary.

"In Kosovo, we knew that ethnic cleansing was going on. We knew what had happened in Bosnia and Rwanda. After months of diplomatic effort, it was clear that there was no other option but to use force for a humanitarian cause."

Axworthy said he grew up in a religious household with an aversion to war. Faced with that internal conflict, he sought out the advice of a minister in Ottawa.

"We spent four hours debating when the use of force could be justified," Axworthy said. "While my decision was guided by my religious considerations, it was not based on any kind of divine revelation."

Axworthy did urge his cabinet colleagues to approve Canadian participation in the Kosovo intervention. He was also forced to argue his case for war with a group of Christian ministers who were opposed to the use of force under any circumstances, he said.

"Unfortunately, so much of our public discourse in recent years has deteriorated to the level of a medieval crusade," he said.

"Particularly in the United States, there are powerful groups encroaching in the separation of church and state. When you cross that line, the results are theocracy and dictatorship."

He spoke of Rafael Lempkin, a Jewish lawyer from Poland who escaped the Nazis and settled in America in 1942. Lempkin, Axworthy said, was the first advocate of an international law outlawing genocide, a law that was promulgated by the newly formed UN General Assembly in 1948.

Axworthy touched on the problem of child soldiers in several countries around the world, a situation that he has been working to combat for many years.

"It all comes back to the question of how we apply our responsibility to protect people around the world," he said. "How do we determine when and how the United Nations should become involved?"

Following his presentation, Axworthy joined a panel that included Rabbi Balser, United Church Minister Loraine MacKenzie Shepherd and Baptist Minister Greg Glatz.

Rabbi Balser argued that in the case of child abuse, the state has determined that the right of the child to protection overrules the sanctity of the family and that the same reasoning should apply where sovereign nations abuse their citizens.

"The Torah requires us to act if someone's life is in danger," he pointed out.

"In situations such as Darfur, our duty as religious leaders is to yell 'gevalt.' Where are our peace makers and peace keepers?

"I would love to see some kind of interfaith network developed," he said.

"As Jews, we tend to take a parochial view. We are so concerned about anti-Semitism and the need to protect Israel that we lose sight of other issues."

Axworthy pointed out that individual actions can lead to great results. He noted that the fight against slavery in England began with 12 Quakers in 1788. (In 1807, the government banned the slave trade, and slave ownership was outlawed in 1833.)

He noted how ordinary Canadians who were stockholders of Canadian-based Talisman Oil were able to force the company to leave Sudan when the Canadian government was unsuccessful in the same effort.

Israeli psychologist launches book on terrorism

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Trauma of Terrorism: Sharing Knowledge and Shared Care, An International Handbook, edited by Danny Brom and Yael Danieli, has recently been launched in various cities around the world.

Following the textbook's delivery to the United Nations in New York and a second U.S. launch hosted by Senator Hillary Clinton, Brom appeared in Ottawa to launch the book in Canada. The event, held on Parliament Hill last week, was hosted by Carolyn Bennett, minister of state for public health.

Director of the Israel Center for Treatment of Psychotrauma as well as the scientific director of the Temmy and Albert Latner Institute for Research in Social Psychiatry and Psychotherapy at Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem, Brom is a clinical psychologist who is originally from Holland and moved to Israel in 1988.

Bennett recounted her first experience with post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) many years ago on a family vacation in Hawaii, where she encountered a Vietnam veteran who suffered from it. "I was still in pre-meds and was totally unprepared," she said. She cited the examples of Lt.-Gen. Roméo Dallaire and Lt.-Gov. James Bartleman, both of whom have publicly spoken of their personal struggles to overcome PTSD, which has helped to educate Canadians about the problem. "The existence of a textbook like this is huge in moving best practices forward," she said.

Having visited Herzog Hospital while visiting Israel, Bennett was impressed with the facility and its programs. She expressed interest in working on joint programs with Israel, to share the research and expertise developed in Israel with Canadians. "I, as always, look forward to ongoing partnerships," she said.

Brom prefaced his remarks by reading a poem written by an Israeli schoolgirl. "The main point that I would like to make is by reading a poem that was written by a 14-year-old girl that is not suffering from PTSD but is an ordinary 14-year-old girl who scribbled it on a paper and gave it to her teacher," he said.

The poem poignantly revealed how terrorism has coloured every aspect of daily living in Israel. "This brings home the message that we in the field of terrorism are not talking about PTSD; we are talking about an attack on the fabric of society," said Brom.

"We have to develop resiliency- building services," he said. Recognizing that there may not be money available for programs, Brom suggested that the educational system could be an alternative delivery system for mental health services if proper testing and training were provided. "At the end of the day, we will become a stronger society or societies as the result of people trying to weaken us," he said.

Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker said that "the international community doesn't know how to deal with terrorism on any level… I am sure that this book and the contributions in this book will help move this forward in how to deal with it…

"Let me congratulate Herzog Hospital for the work that it is doing. I don't think there is any hospital in the world that has such a huge challenge in the work that it does. Let's hope that the next time you [Brom] come and give a book presentation, it will be about something happy that we can enjoy rather than about something that hurts us."

Also in attendance at the book launch were members of Parliament Susan Kaddis (Thornhill), James Lunney (Nanaimo) and Jean Augustine (Etobicoke).

Vancouver federation campaign tops $6 million

VANCOUVER — Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver has announced that it has reached its $6 million fundraising goal for the 2004 Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) Campaign.

This accomplishment represents the latest in a series of fundraising breakthroughs for the Jewish Federation, the central fundraising and planning body for the Greater Vancouver Jewish community.

Since 2001, CJA has increased its annual results by a cumulative 40 per cent. CJA has grown from $4.2 million in 2001 to just over $6 million in 2004. The 8 per cent increase achieved in the 2004 campaign translates to $450,000 in new dollars while the 2003 appeal generated more than $1 million in new funds.

In addition to new dollars, the number of donors has also increased over the past years. Since 2002, more than 1,200 new donors have made gifts. These are individuals or families who made first-time gifts to the community campaign or returned to contributing after an absence.

The Combined Jewish Appeal provides annual funding for communal programs delivered by Jewish organizations in Greater Vancouver, across Canada, and in Israel and other Jewish communities around the world. Vital programs and services receive funding in the areas of human services, education, community building, arts & culture, and youth.

This announcement comes as Federation marks its 18th year. Since its establishment in 1986, Federation's Combined Jewish Appeal has raised over $75 million to sustain and grow the local Jewish community and to strengthen Jewish life in Israel and around the world.

Jeffrey Goldberg, CJA general campaign chair, explained that this unprecedented growth comes from hard work, and dedicated volunteers and staff, but most importantly from the deep generosity on the part of the donors. "We have so many to thank for our success," Goldberg said.

Federation is particularly grateful for a $100,000 challenge grant from the Phyliss and Irving Snider Foundation, which helped generate the final push that put the campaign over its goal. The 2004 campaign includes gifts from more than 3,300 individuals and families.

Locally in Greater Vancouver, 24 agencies receive allocations to deliver programs and services. Monies earmarked for programs beyond the Lower Mainland are directed to the United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC). Most of those funds support the work of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), and the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC).

Abbas set to change stance on right of return

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas was set to tell militant Palestinian factions meeting in Cairo this week that the right of return of refugees should be looked upon "realistically" and that not all Palestinian exiles will return to former homes in Israel and the territories, Israel Radio said, quoting the London-based Asharq al Awsat newspaper.

Palestinian sources told the paper that Abbas would tell the participants in the Cairo parley that the right of return cannot be fully implemented and that those who cannot return should get compensation.

Palestinian officials hoped the planned three days of discussions would conclude with a declaration of a hudna, or ceasefire, to which all Palestinian organizations would agree, including such rejectionist groups as Hamas and the Islamic Jihad.

Abbas is expected to ask the groups to agree to a truce even if Israel violates it. He will stress that he will hold firm in talks with Israel on other core issues, including Jerusalem, settlements and the release of Palestinian prisoners.

The unofficial Palestinian position is that refugees who wish to do so – primarily those who live in Lebanon – should be allowed to re-settle in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and those who choose not to should receive compensation.

Rejectionist groups have long held that Israel has no right to exist, and that once the Jewish state is dismantled, all refugees should return to their former homes and villages.

Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz was preparing to meet Monday with Palestinian Interior Minister Nasser Yousef over the deadlock around the transfer of West Bank towns to Palestinian security control.

> 'The PA must also end incitement in mosques and eliminate anti-Israeli incitement in PA textbooks'

The two sides hope to settle the latest dispute, which has delayed the Palestinian Authority's assuming control of Jericho. Should Israel and the PA reach a breakthrough, it will likely speed up the transfer of Tulkarm as well.

Sharon and Abbas held an indirect exchange of views Sunday night, starting with Abbas telling Channel 1 that, after the anticipated announcement this week of a formal ceasefire by all Palestinian factions, he would be ready for full-scale diplomatic talks.

Sharon was meeting with United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan Sunday night in Jerusalem when the state-run television station carried the interview with Abbas. Sharon responded by telling Annan that there would be no progress on the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan until Palestinian armed factions are completely disarmed, rejecting Abbas' proposal that a ceasefire would be enough to allow the start of final status negotiations.

Sharon told Annan – who was in Israel for the opening of the new Holocaust History Museum at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority – that the PA must also end incitement in mosques and eliminate anti-Israeli incitement in PA textbooks before Israel would agree to peace negotiations. Sharon said there has been a drop in incitement, but it's not enough.

Sharon also told Annan that Hezbollah's meddling in Palestinian affairs, including by financing terrorist attacks, was endangering Abbas' rule.

U.S. to pay $25.5 million to survivors over 'gold train' affair

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

MIAMI — The U.S. government reached a $25.5 million (US) settlement last week with the families of Hungarian Holocaust victims and will acknowledge the U.S. Army's role in commandeering a trainload of the families' treasures during World War II.

Under terms of the settlement, the money will be distributed to needy Hungarian Holocaust survivors rather those who lost family possessions.

"The case never really was about money alone. It was about having a reckoning with history," said Sam Dubbin, one of the families' lawyers.

The U.S. Justice Department issued a statement saying it was "very pleased to announce" the settlement but said it would be inappropriate to add comment on a pending legal matter.

A commission appointed by then-U.S. president Bill Clinton concluded in 1999 that high-ranking U.S. Army officers and troops plundered the so-called "Gold Train" after it was intercepted on its way to Germany in May 1945.

The train carried gold, jewels, 1,200 paintings, silver, china, porcelain, 3,000 Oriental carpets and other heirlooms seized from Jewish families by the Nazis. The cargo would be worth $45 million to $90 million in today's currency.

About $21 million in funding for humanitarian services will be distributed to social service agencies worldwide, based on a country's percentage of survivors, including 40 per cent in Israel, 22 per cent in Hungary, 21 per cent in the United States and 7 per cent in Canada.

Young U.S. Jews more ambivalent on Israel, study says

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The attachment of American Jews to Israel has weakened measurably in the last two years, according to a study carried out by Prof. Steven Cohen of Hebrew University, a leading researcher of U.S. Jewry.

The study was conducted using identical questionnaires circulated during 2002 and 2004 among 1,448 Jewish families. It was funded by the Jewish Agency for Israel's Jewish-Zionist education department.

Cohen's findings, published last month, reinforce findings suggesting that there is a drop in support for Israel among U.S. Jews, especially among youth and university students.

Unlike many in the American Jewish community, Cohen doesn't believe the declining support stems from opposition to Israeli policies in the territories, but rather from the recent lull in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The findings show a drop between 2002 and 2004 in nearly all indicators measuring emotional attachment to Israel.

Forty-three per cent of those asked agreed with the statement that "Israel feels to me more about my parents' and grandparents' generation than to me and my generation."

Another recent study, carried out on behalf of the United Jewish Communities of North America, showed that only four per cent of Jewish students with a non-Jewish parent feel a special link to Israel. Forty-five per cent of U.S. Jewish students have a non-Jewish parent.

The timing of Cohen's second poll, conducted in December 2004 – a relatively quiet period in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict – may have had a significant impact on the question of whether the intifadah has been the main reason for the growing distance between American Jewry and Israel.

A number of researchers who study U.S. Jewry, including Prof. Shulamit Reinharz of Brandeis University, argue that the conflict damaged the image of Israeli "purity" among U.S. Jews and led many to distance themselves from the Jewish state.

This view is echoed by Jewish university organizations, including Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, and the umbrella organization Israel on Campus Coalition, which blame the intifadah for a reduction in visits by American Jewish youth to Israel.

Cohen doesn't accept that thesis.

"During the intifadah years, American Jews did visit Israel less, but cared for it more. Today we see more visits, but they care much less," he said.

"In the distant past, the Israelis were viewed as heroes, and in the recent past as victims. Today, they are neither heroes nor victims. Israel is increasingly viewed as boring and irrelevant to American Jewry."

A 2003 study by political consultant Frank Luntz showed that support for Israel among young American Jews was far weaker than among their parents.

Cohen says that young American Jews have preserved their personal Jewish identities, but not their collective one. He says that studies he has conducted showing stability in aspects of Jewish tradition and religious obligations confirm this.

Among other findings of Cohen's 2004 study:

• About 15 per cent of American Jews said they planned to visit Israel in the next three years, compared with 12 per cent of American Jews in 2002. Some 24 per cent said they encouraged someone to visit Israel in the past year, compared with 19 per cent previously.

• About 26 per cent of American Jews were very emotionally attached to Israel in 2004, compared with 31 per cent in 2002. When asked how much being Jewish has to do with caring about Israel, 48 per cent said a lot in 2004, compared with 58 per cent in the earlier survey.

• The number of U.S. Jews who made a contribution to an Israel-related charity dropped nine percentage points from 2002 to 40 per cent in 2004. About 22 per cent attended an Israel-related program in 2004, down from 27 per cent in 2002.

• Questions of Jewish identity remained relatively constant. Asked how important being Jewish is in a person's life, 57 per cent said very in 2004, compared with 54 per cent in 2002. Some 42 per cent said they were members of a synagogue in 2004, compared with 43 per cent in 2002.

Hamas will participate in Palestinian parliamentary elections

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Comment

It seems to be an oxymoron: a terrorist group sworn to Israel's destruction joining a Palestinian Authority now engaged in political negotiation with the Jewish state.

But this apparently will be the case come July, when Hamas takes part in Palestinian parliamentary elections in the West Bank and Gaza Strip – and puts Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government in a diplomatic bind.

The radical Islamic group has boycotted elections conducted by the PA.

But on Saturday, Hamas official Mohammed Razal announced that the group had decided to run for seats in the Palestinian Legislative Council "for the sake of the people and to rectify political failings."

The "road map" peace plan calls for the PA to dismantle and disarm Hamas and other terrorist groups in the West Bank and Gaza.

But PA President Mahmoud Abbas has made it clear that he has no intention of implementing this clause to the letter. He prefers to talk rival factions into laying down their arms.

Abbas said that these talks would bear fruit at a conference in Cairo this week, when he predicted that 13 Palestinian groups, including Hamas and Islamic Jihad, would agree to his cease-fire with Israel.

And Israel, apparently pleased at Abbas' success in calming down Gaza before it quits the coastal territory this summer, has not been protesting too much.

"Against the background of cries for liquidating the infrastructure of terror, the Palestinian leadership realizes, and Israel also understands, that there is no other choice than to co-operate with these organizations, which hold a violent right of veto over the peace process," said Ha'aretz commentator Zvi Barel.

"The readiness of these organizations to participate in Palestinian politics, and at the same time adopt a ceasefire, with Egypt granting them an umbrella of legitimacy, is part of the upheaval currently under way," he said.

Privately, some Israeli officials accept that Hamas may have made a strategic turnaround.

"No one expects the group to change its charter," said one official on condition of anonymity, referring to a document that calls for Israel's destruction. "The question is how ready it is to act on this. An end to violence and terrorism is always a good thing, even if its motives are cynical."

Before and even during the last 4½ years of fighting, senior Hamas leaders hinted that they could "accept" rather than recognize Israel's existence if Palestinians get statehood in the West Bank and Gaza. Under this doctrine, the group would "suspend" indefinitely its quest to wipe out Israel.

Many believe that in Hamas' scheme of things, the well-being of the Palestinians comes well ahead of the jihad against the Jewish state.

Unlike Islamic Jihad, a group whose activities are devoted exclusively to terrorism and which has already announced that it will boycott the July elections, Hamas has a network of charities in the West Bank and Gaza. Its politicians are considered to be honest, in comparison with the corruption that has tainted many Palestinian Authority officials.

"With Hamas, you know who you are dealing with," the Israeli official said.

"If they call off the jihad, that is the way it will be. And who knows – maybe the very act of getting into politics, of dealing with the day-to-day of nation-building the West Bank and Gaza, will in itself mellow the group."

But Jerusalem is still a long way off from having to deal with a Hamas successor to Abbas. Razal said his group has no intention of seeking seats in the PA's cabinet for now.

There is also the prospect of Palestinian infighting.

Fatah, the dominant PA faction, has been watching with concern the popularity Hamas has garnered in local polls, and it is redoubling its efforts to win hearts in the West Bank and Gaza. It's not just a matter of political jockeying: Fatah represents a more moderate Palestinian, who is unhappy with the idea of Hamas ushering in a Muslim theocracy.

An example of this infighting happened Sunday. In the run-up to campus elections in Hebron University, activists from the rival factions faced off with fists and rocks. Eight students were hurt.

U.N. official seeks balance

The United Nations' human rights chief called for Israel to be treated more fairly by the international forum. "I hope Israel would receive a more balanced treatment in the framework of the changes slated to take place in United Nations institutions, especially in those dealing with human rights," Canadian Louise Arbour, high commissioner of the UN Human Rights Commission, said during a Geneva meeting with Israel's minister for Diaspora affairs, Natan Sharansky. The annual six-week session of the commission convenes this week in Geneva.

Gaza security talks progress

Israel made progress on a plan to pull troops out of a contentious zone between the Gaza Strip and Egypt. After meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said the two countries had reached a basic agreement on an Israeli pullout from the zone, called the Philadelphia corridor, the Jerusalem Post reported. Mofaz, though, later said that another meeting was needed to iron out "some disagreement we faced about Philadelphia."

PA effort vs. results

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said further attacks on Israel from the West Bank and Gaza Strip are inevitable. "They must understand that we cannot achieve 100 per cent control, but we exert 100 per cent effort," Abbas told Reuters, referring to Israeli demands for counterterrorist crackdowns as required by the U.S.-led "road map" peace plan. "We must expect more attacks because there are some who want to sabotage efforts," Abbas said. "The war between us and the Israelis is over."

Settlement furor escalates

Israel's Housing Ministry should be relieved of its authority over settlement building in the West Bank, the author of a report on such construction said. Talia Sasson made the comment after releasing her report showing that the government funded illegal outpost construction. Of 105 such outposts, 54 were built on land that did not belong to Israel, including 15 on Palestinian land. Sasson said the cabinet should assume responsibility for construction.

Long arm of the law

Israel captured a Palestinian police officer who allegedly took part in the 2000 lynching of two of its army reservists. The Palestinian, who fled to Egypt after allegedly taking part in the mob killing in the West Bank city of Ramallah, was arrested in January upon returning through the Gaza Strip, the Shin Bet said. According to Israeli sources, dozens of Palestinians are in custody for the lynching at a Ramallah police station. The two soldiers took a wrong turn into Ramallah.

Yad Vashem's new museum offers more personal approach

By ELI STUTZ
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial, has built a new museum four times the size of the original.

The new museum was to open to the public March 15, during a ceremony attended by an unprecedented number of dignitaries from Israel and around the world. Heading the delegations were United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan, as well as heads of state, prime ministers and senior ministers from some 40 countries.

Representatives were to come from Portugal, Ukraine, Finland, Ireland and Hungary. Italy sent Senate chair, Marcelo Pera, and the U.S. delegation was led by New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg. Prominent figures attending included author Elie Wiesel, museum and memorial directors and scores of Jewish philanthropists from around the world.

President Moshe Katsav and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon were to hold receptions for the participants and meet with visiting heads of state.

In addition to the Holocaust History Museum, several other smaller museums will be inaugurated in the coming year at Yad Vashem, reflecting the profound interest in the Israeli world of art in the Holocaust and featuring a film archives with thousands of testimonies of survivors. The new museums are the final phase of a multi-year development plan devised in 1994.

In an interview with The CJN, Yad Vashem's senior art researcher, Eliad Moreh Rosenberg, who was involved in the design of the new museum, explained Yad Vashem's aims in building the new museum.

CJN: Why did Yad Vashem decide to replace its historical museum?

Rosenberg: A number of reasons motivated Yad Vashem to undergo such a drastic change. First, with more than two million visitors in the past four years, the old museum was simply too small to handle the number of people coming to see it. Secondly, the old museum was built during the '60s with the idea of documenting the history leading up to and during the Holocaust. While we succeeded in conveying the facts, the human element was sometimes lost. Through the new museum we wanted to give a more personal approach to the visitor of the new millennium, so that he or she could not just connect to the collective story, but also find in the context of the Holocaust the story of the individual victim.

CJN: What techniques are used to achieve this personal connection?

Rosenberg: The new museum has a collection of diaries and photographs. We tried to give the identity of the victim beside each photograph. There are over 100 videos, many of which are testimonies of survivors. There are works of art, poetry, quotations and artifacts that belonged to the victims. Beside each artifact is the name of the person to whom the artifact belonged. When you see the artifacts, you can relate to them. A person can read and read about the six million, yet it's impossible to grasp what happened in its entirety. But sometimes a single object can bring it home to you.

CJN: Can you give an example?

Rosenberg: The Theresienstadt ghetto was a propaganda ghetto, set up by the Nazis to show the world how humane they were with the Jews. In this ghetto, many artists were forced to draw propaganda pieces for the Nazis. But at the same time, they drew the real face of their experience.

Charlotte Buresova was one such painter. One of her paintings is of a three-year-old child named Clarence Waldenberg. It's very powerful to see the picture of his baby-face, with his strong dark eyes. For the Jews there, it was a symbol of hope – seeing this cute child in the ghetto. To the Nazis, we were just numbers, statistics. They denied our personal characteristics, trying to remove our identities. Buresova's portraits give back the identity to the victims.

CJN: Is the new museum going to speak to a new generation of children who will never have met a living Holocaust survivor?

Rosenberg: We hope so. That was the main objective of the new museum. We wanted to relate the story to people who don't have anyone to tell them what happened. We put an incredible amount of effort into displaying the artifacts and works of art so that they themselves tell the story.

CJN: How is the reaction to the new museum from the first visitors?

Rosenberg: The museum was initially opened just for journalists. I spoke with a number of foreign, non-Jewish journalists, after they had seen it. They told me they were extremely impressed. They said that while they knew the story of the Holocaust, seeing all the testimonies, the real objects, did something to them. They came out of the museum asking themselves the question, "How could such things happen – how could humanity descend to this level?"

CJN: Is there any attempt to connect the anti-Semitism of the Holocaust to the anti-Semitism that Israel experiences today?

Rosenberg: Not really. The Holocaust is such a big subject and Yad Vashem is totally dedicated to documenting what happened. People can make the connection to today's world themselves. I think that Yad Vashem serves as a signal. When each person visits Yad Vashem, he has to decide for himself about how he should be committed to tolerance and to the fight against anti-Semitism and racism in general. We don't want to give lessons. The museum speaks for itself, and each visitor must come to his own conclusions.

CanWest fights for control of Jerusalem Post

By HADAR HORESH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — "I have no intention of making changes in the Jerusalem Post. The paper as it is now is a good newspaper, and I like it very much," says Leonard Asper, in an exclusive interview with Ha'aretz.

Asper, 40, is the controlling shareholder in the Canadian media giant CanWest Global Communications Corp. In 2000, CanWest acquired most of the Hollinger International newspaper network. Last year, CanWest also purchased the Jerusalem Post from Hollinger, but a legal battle over control of the newspaper erupted between Asper and his partner in the acquisition of the paper, businessman Eli Azur, the head of Mirkaei Tikshoret.

It is not clear what exactly transpired between Asper and Azur during the last few months of 2004. Asper says that he was sure that he was about to buy the Post from Hollinger, in equal partnership with Azur, a young and energetic Israeli businessman who came with references from well-known banks. The partnership appeared surprising: Azur, a veteran of commercial street fights on the margins of the media world, was making his first foray into big business's major leagues. But in the end, Azur wound up with total ownership of the Post, while Asper went to court alleging that Azur had violated the agreement to work toward joint acquisition. Asper's associates suspect that Azur had discovered the newspaper's great business potential, particularly the value of its real estate assets, and decided to get out of the agreement. Azur's associates say that Asper has far-reaching plans to change the paper's editorial policy and replace the editor. Asper believes that a public battle will help him get back in the deal, while Azur prefers to have his say in court.

CanWest was founded by his late father, Israel (Izzy) Asper, a tax attorney who began to acquire television stations in 1974, first in his hometown of Winnipeg, then all over Canada. Later, the Asper empire expanded to television and radio stations in Australia and New Zealand as well.

The company bid for one of Israel's Channel 2 franchises in 1994 but didn't win. Ten years later, businessman Yossi Maiman tried to interest the Aspers in investing in Channel 10, to replace his partners who had abandoned the company. "The business plan didn't suit us," says Asper. The Aspers aren't participating either in the race of foreign businessmen to invest in Channel 2 on the eve of the tender that is taking place now. "We were focused on the Jerusalem Post deal," he says.

Although the sale of the Post for $13.2 million is not among the largest transactions that have been carried out recently in Israel, it is still more than five times as much as tycoon Haim Saban invested in Channel 2. The amount is similar to the sum that Arnon Milchan plans to invest in Channel 10 shares.

"People I knew in Canada introduced us," says Asper of Azur, "and told me that he's all right. It was a mistake to do business with him. He can decide that he doesn't want the partnership with us, but that doesn't give him the right to kick us out of the transaction. Now I'm told that it's his usual business behaviour, to quarrel with partners."

Their future relationship is being discussed in court. The partnership agreement was not implemented. Azur acquired the Post on his own, an investment of $13.2 million, which was funded by a loan from Bank Leumi. CanWest sued Azur in New York, saying that according to the agreement between them, any dispute would be adjudicated in an American court. Azur is suing CanWest in the Jerusalem District Court for damages.

Leonard Asper

Asper says he was loath to bring the transaction to the courts. He has ambitious plans for the newspaper. "It has to be a strong international brand name, like Apple and Coca-Cola, through which we will be able to present the facts about Israel and to fight anti-Semitism and anti-Israel propaganda," he says.

He rejects the idea that it would be a propaganda tool: "We are only planning to bring the precise and objective facts to public attention, against the false propaganda of those who are anti-Israel."

The Aspers have always been enthusiastic Zionists. The founder, the elder Asper, was a great fan of former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin. Asper does not deny his connections with Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, but insists that the family supports the Israeli government of the day, regardless of its political identity. "We support the government and the efforts to bring peace that will make Israel safe and will bring economic prosperity," he says.

A strong pro-Israel line dominates the opinion pages of the media outlets controlled by the family, and occasionally the family funds the production of films and investigations designed to support Israeli public relations. Asper media produced a film that was screened here on Channel 1 and was designed to refute allegations made in the pro-Palestinian film Jenin, Jenin.

Azur says that one reason for the dispute is Asper's desire to give the newspaper an extreme right-wing orientation. Asper denies this, saying that he is not opposed to a critical press. "The role of the press is to transmit information and to open people's eyes. The job of the journalist is to present the facts in an objective manner, and not to camouflage his opinions as fact. There is room for criticism and for expressing opinions, but within the context designed for this purpose – the editorial page," he says.

The dispute between Eli Azur and the Canadian company CanWest broke out in January 2005, when CanWest asked the courts in New York to arbitrate between the company and Azur and to prohibit him from carrying out certain business activities at the Jerusalem Post until the arbitration process has been completed.

CanWest says that Azur ignored an agreement for joint acquisition of the shares of the Post according to which CanWest and Mirkaei Tikshoret, controlled by Azur, were supposed to each hold half of the paper's shares.

Shortly after CanWest turned to the courts in New York, Azur petitioned the Jerusalem District Court with a request for a declarative ruling to the effect that Mirkaei Tikshoret is the sole owner of the newspaper. In his petition, Azur says that CanWest is trying to change the editorial policy of the newspaper. Azur is now working to bring in new partners to the newspaper, and has signed an agreement to sell 31 per cent of the shares to Yaakov Bardugo, former director of the Mifal Hapayis national lottery.

Azur says that "there has never been an agreement signed between us and CanWest, and CanWest never invested a single dollar in the purchase of the Jerusalem Post. In light of the legal proceedings taking place on the matter, we are not interested in elaborating on our response or in answering other complaints raised by Asper."

Spa at Westin Harbour Castle offers a variety of services

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Carrots, rosehip tea, cinnamon and wild plum… no, it's not the room service menu at The Westin Harbour Castle Toronto, but the product ingredients used for esthetic treatments at the hotel's Votre Beauté European Day Spa.

The owner of Votre Beauté is Judith Tauby, a well-established esthetician with 35 years in the spa business. Before opening her present location in the Westin Harbour Castle's north tower, Tauby operated a day spa on Queen's Quay and prior to that, one on Bloor Street.

Unlike many spas at which the treatment rooms are situated on sub-levels in windowless rooms, all eight of Votre Beauté's rooms are bright and airy, offering spa guests a great view of Lake Ontario and Toronto Island while they indulge in an array of treatments.

"Our décor has been described as Milano chic with very clean lines and neutral tones – great for relaxing," says head esthetician Ronite Tauby, the owner's daughter.

"A wonderful feature here is a floor-to-ceiling natural water flow. One of our rooms is a couple's room, which includes a Bouvier tub with 144 jets… Also in the room is a custom-built aqua therapy rainfall shower over a bench that seats two."

Votre Beauté's has a staff of 12, consisting of registered massage therapists, estheticians, makeup artists and hairdressers. "We are a full-service spa that includes pedicures, manicures, facials, reflexology, aromatherapy, massages, body treatments, hydrotherapy and aqua therapy, which is massage under a hose," Tauby says.

"We use three product lines, Carole Franck and France Laure from France and Éminence from Hungary. Éminence is 100 per cent organic and all the products are heavily concentrated and mixed with waters, teas and juices in order to activate as well as emulsify them. The products are highly active, so they work very well with your skin." All products used by the spa are based on grains, flowers and fruits.

Tauby says that one of the spa's signature treatments is "the multi-herbal facial." It is customized "with a choice of six different masks, such as the Eight Greens Phyto Masque that helps to rejuvenate fatigued skin."

Votre Beauté's newest signature treatment is the Multi-Grain Body Booster, a multi-stage body treatment that begins with a 10-grain scrub exfoliator with cinnamon, followed by a carrot mask for hydration. The guest is wrapped in camomile- and eucalyptus-dipped towels, then covered in plastic while lying on a vibrating massage bed, which helps stimulate the product into the skin.

After 20 minutes, you enter the aqua rainfall shower and the treatment ends with a massage with cinnamon-based cream, which Tauby says is good to combat water retention and cellulite. Be forewarned – the delicious aromas wafting off your body will make you hungry!

Votre Beauté offers its clients – which have included sports personalities such as Toronto Raptors players, celebrities like rocker Tommy Lee Jones and former U.S. secretary of state Madeline Albright – services à la carte or from a variety of packages. You Deserve It includes a European facial, rejuvenating manicure and pedicure and a half-session aromatherapy massage. The Ultimate gives you a double oxygen facial, spa manicure and pedicure, milk essence hydrotherapy, rainfall aqua therapy and a half-session massage therapy. Just The Two Of Us, done in the couple's treatment room, includes two European facials, rejuvenating manicures and pedicures and half-session massages.

Guests of The Westin Harbour Castle Toronto may purchase a spa/hotel package. The package – in addition to a choice of one of the hotel's deluxe, spacious 977 rooms or suites featuring its famous "heavenly beds" – includes a $100 gift certificate toward any spa service at Votre Beauté.

The hotel is dog friendly, so if you are travelling with Fido or Fifi, your canine friend will be pampered in a "heavenly dog bed," while you are being ministered to at the spa.

Votre Beauté European Day Spa is open seven days a week. For more information, visit www.votrebeautespa. com. To book an appointment, call 416-203-8483. To book a hotel/spa package call The Westin Harbour Castle Toronto at 416-869-1600.

Anti-aging formula is 'nothing short of miraculous'

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

This might sound like an advertorial, an endorsement or perhaps an ad, but what you are about to read about is without question one of the most innovative anti-aging formulas available.

Empress' Secret is an ancient Chinese tea that nourishes you from within and enhances your outer beauty, including restoring hair colour. It is nothing short of miraculous.

Originally designed by royal physicians, its sole purpose was to keep emperors and empresses' families youthful, healthy and tremendously vital. The physicians prescribed different herbal medicines based on the mood, stress level, pulse and symptoms of complaints. The effects of the tea were sensational and all vied for the magical formula that was kept hidden.

Dr. Sherman Lai, a renowned traditional Chinese medical practitioner, has for years been creating healing formulas that help those with various conditions and illnesses, including menopause and cancer, and that help build up the immune system.

Years ago, Lai met an 80-year-old Chinese gong-fu master at a martial arts function in Taiwan and everything changed for him from that moment on.

When the master realized Lai was a traditional Chinese medicine practitioner and a martial arts expert, the master decided to share a few of his secrets. He showed him some herbal remedies that were hundreds of years old. One of these remedies was Empress' Secret.

Lai has been searching for a modern method of remaking the complex ancient formula. Finally, with the help of some breakthrough technologies, in March

The Pearl Girls make stunning beaded brooches

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

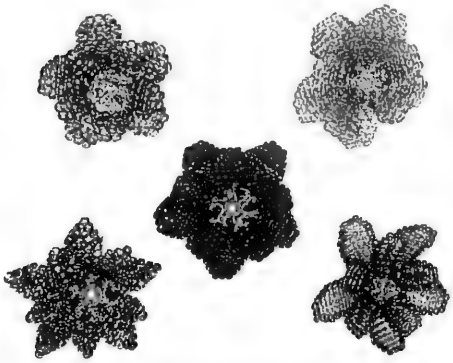
Today high quality crystal jewelry can be seen on runways, and it is worn by trend-setters and celebrities.

Recognizing the interest in costume jewelry, Arlene Himel began creating flower brooches made with Czech crystal beads.

When friends and family saw her one-of-a-kind Swarovski pins in a myriad of colours with pearl or rhinestone centres, she began to get orders. Some people chose from the variety of pins she prepares in advance and others would specify the colours, designs and combinations of stones they preferred.

To handle the growing demand for the pins, Himel invited her sister, Gail Atkins, to join into a partnership. Using their maiden name, Pearl, the multi-talented sisters became Crystal Blooms by The Pearl Girls.

Himel, the mother of two and grandmother of one, studied at the Ontario College of Art, Buckhorn School of Fine Arts and Seneca College. She has made needlepoint canvasses, quilts and ceramics. She worked as corporate affairs officer at Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation and volunteers for the Kidney Foundation. In retirement, she says, she finds beading relaxing and gets lost in the creativity.



Brooches by Crystal Blooms by The Pearl Girls.

Atkins, a semi-retired schoolteacher, mother of three and grandmother of two, also studied at the Ontario College of Art and the Buckhorn School. She has quilted, done needlepoint and ceramics, and painted. Along with an active family life, she is a volunteer for the United Jewish Appeal.

Himel says, "Our mother, Esther Pearl, was always designing and knitting creations such as dolls' clothing and other items. The proceeds were donated to several charities."

Himel and Atkins say that their mother taught them, as children, to design and knit.

"I always had a love of beads," says Himel. "Gail and I began beading sweaters and working with a variety of beads when we were teenagers."

Atkins adds that they always did things together and are enjoying their Crystal Blooms venture.

It all began a year ago when Himel saw a picture of some jewelry in a magazine. "I realized that I knew how to do the beaded jewelry since I did this beading 35 years ago."

She began experimenting with high quality crystal beads. "It took me some time until I was happy with the designs," she says.

"It is very time intensive as it can take between 300 and 700 beads, which are strung on wire."

Atkins says that when she saw her sister's brooch designs, she "realized that they were beautiful, elegant, exquisite. Arlene taught me her method and that's when we formed the partnership."

Their display case includes pins in several designs, in a variety of sizes, and in more than 35 colours.

"Every colour is in style today" says Atkins.

"We receive requests for paler colours for the spring and summer and darker ones in the winter. But many people will wear any colour throughout the year."

They note that pins can be worn on sweaters, jackets, coats, jeans, belts, hats, necklaces and even on a purse or shoes.

Each brooch has two small inconspicuous pearls at the back to identify The Pearl Girls.

The cost of the pins is $100 to $130, with a portion donated to the Mount Sinai Hospital.

For more information, call Arlene Himel, 416-580-9994, or Gail Atkins, 416-488-0103.

Anti-aging formula

2001 Lai found a way to formulate his first batch of Empress' Secret.

He began 12 months of studies to make sure that the tea was effective. The studies produced remarkable results. Subjects had increased vitality, minimized pores and wrinkles, and their grey hair had returned to its original colour. One lady felt that someone was gently stretching her entire body skin, making it feel softer and firmer. That is only the beginning of the effects of Empress' Secret.

Lai says the amazing results of drinking the tea also include:

- significantly reduced wrinkles around the eyes and mouth;
- lifting of sagging facial skin, including around the chin;
- firmer skin overall and firmer breasts;
- change of eye colour from green to ocean blue, which indicates healthier liver function;
- dramatically improved energy and sex drive;
- more muscle gain through workouts, and weight begins to stabilize;
- brown skin colour pigmentation minimized, and sometimes disappears; and
- improved eyesight.

Empress' Secret is made of exquisite Chinese herbs; each one has a unique function for a woman's health. The benefits of each herb has been well documented in Chinese herbal texts and proof of no side effects has been established. Empress' Secret is prepared by a certified "Good Manufactory Practice" herbal manufactory in Taiwan.

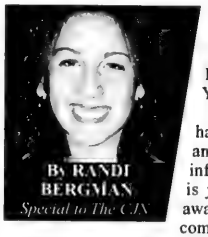
I started using Empress' Secret in December 2003, and let me tell you, the results are fantastic. My skin has never looked better, I look younger, my hair is 50 per cent brown (from grey) and my energy is vastly improved! Treat yourself to the fountain of youth! I love it.

Empress' Secret is available through Sherman Lai, C.M.D., Dr.Ac., and BSc at Oriental Healing Arts Research Inc. Guelph, Ont, telephone 1-519-763-6340. The cost is $158+ GST per bottle. Two bottles are required per month. Recommended length of usage is six months, although results are usually seen in the first month or two.

The new millennium cool

These days, it seems that fashion is just a tad bit confusing.

It is five years into the new millennium, and we still lack a definitive style. It was elegance in the 1940s, excess in the '80s, but it seems like the '00s are just a regurgitation of other eras.



By Randi Bergman
Special to The CJN

With our most beloved designers acting like the greatest schizophrenics of our age, fluctuating between decades and eras, where do we look for a definition?

In 2005, we are not flying in saucers as the '60s so famously predicted. In fact, space age garb seems a bit passé. If looking back is fashionable, then what can be defined as the style of the new millennium?

Perhaps millennium style is that of confusion itself.

Since 9/11, the world has become a scarier place. Every day, we turn on our televisions hoping for something pleasant, but all we're left with is uncertainty and disorder. The reflection of this in our clothing styles is all too obvious.

Re-invention of old wonders has taken precedence and we swing back and forth in our definition of cool, trying to put our finger on a time when things seemed a little more comfortable and safe. Take, for example, designer John Galliano, who is known far and wide for his eccentricities. Within the span of two years, through his collections, he has channelled ancient Egypt, czarist Russia and Warhol's New York.

And this new eclecticism has been accepted with wide and open arms. In the age of information, when everything is just a hop, click or jump away, being creative is welcomed.

If the tank top is everywhere, why not pair it with something that isn't? If Beyonce is already there, why not delve further into an early Tina Turner?

The new millennium is quite strange, even though we are not travelling by flying saucer. We search for an inner comfort level, and this is reflected in our clothing as well. We are confused on the inside, but on the outside it doesn't look all that bad!

BEAUTY NEWS: Spiced floral blends surround the spring beauty diva. Pearls and shimmer adorn every body part with colours of mint green, bubble gum pink and aubergine. Sexy, smouldering eyes dazzle with smoky shades, and lips are glossed and pumped up with everything.

• SpaMedica is introducing Bio Alcamid, a new soft tissue filler. Bio Alcamid is a gel-like polymer that is soft, mobile and very non-reactive. It is excellent for augmenting and enhancing cheek volume, chin, brow and smile lines. The product will also be valuable for post-liposuction defects. Bio Alcamid, which lasts for many years, is currently approved for soft tissue augmentation in people with soft tissue atrophy syndromes like HIV, TB or cancer, but it will likely be available for the general population later in the spring.

• Maurice Fiorio joins Beauty Shop with a team of experts to beautify you from head to toe. To add to all his talents, Fiorio has recently opened a beauty academy that creates an environment where future stylists are taught the fundamentals of hair. Equipped with a full spa, impeccable hair designers and glorious signature products for both men and woman, the Fiorio salon (108A Cumberland St., Toronto) is second to none. The bath, body and foot care collections are brand new this season, and Fiorio suggests that glam is back for spring, with textured cuts, soft waves and curls. To celebrate, they are offering a complimentary travel size of their new line with the purchase of a new body product! What are you waiting for?

• The Hugo Boss Spring/Summer 2005 Ready-to-Wear Collection reverberates with excitement for both men and women. The black collection features pointed, contemporary men's fashion with a slim silhouette, focusing on luxury fabrics and discreet eye-catchers. Natural colours set the tone, extending from cream, soft pink and sand to mud, graphite and black. The Boss orange collection features a look that is fitted, sharp, slim and sensuous, but always with a light touch. Fabrics are combined, for example, leather, nylon and neoprene. The Boss women's group has a sporty influence detailed with sensual fabrics, ribbons and corsets. A predominantly spicy colour palette with splashes of gold, red, saffron and tangerine are all in the mix.

Dior Kiss: Long-lasting lip gloss.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: Clinique introduces Super Defense Triple Action Moisturizing SPF 25, a multifunctional moisturizer that fights dryness, maintaining an optimal plumpness level for up to 12 hours, with an added punch of antioxidants to fend off free radicals.

Estee Lauder unveils Hydra Complete Multi-Level Moisture Eye Gel Cream. This cool, refreshing gel reduces puffiness and smoothes fine lines – bye, bye puffy!

Lise Watier's latest apple-a-day Hydra-Temps Éclat collection has preventative and curative properties that bring out the derma-cosmetic benefits. It is derived from the flesh and seeds of apples.

Line Peel anti-wrinkle peeling treatment, exclusive from Biotherm, stimulates the skin with a natural, self-peeling process by reactivating essential biological mechanisms, as well as boosting the cellular renewal process.

NeoStrata Sunshield SPF 30 protects and prevents aging of your skin with its new light as air, oil-free sun block lotion.

Shiseido research leads us to an exciting advance – Body Creator Aromatic Sculpting Gel. This gel is launched with Body Creator, an aromatic firming cream and scrub. The results are phenomenal!

Ruban Perle from Chanel's Star Product is an original complexion-illuminating cream. This limited edition is pure luxury. Also from Chanel, the Rectifiance Intense Serum is a retexturizing line corrector that improves the appearance of lines and wrinkles in 3D – length, width and depth.

Dior pioneers Capture Sculpt 10, a global treatment to restore firmness to the entire face by fighting the slackening of the chin and throat.

Cellulite can be reduced and managed

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

For those women in search of products to diminish the orange-peel look of cellulite, there is a new offering now in Toronto from Natura Bel Fitocosmetics of Belgrade, Serbia, exclusively available at Health Winds, The Health And Wellness Spa.

Heather Wells of Bellatri International discovered the organic products through a Serbian friend and was so impressed by the results that she decided to import the line to Canada. Upon her return from visiting the manufacturer in Serbia, Wells approached Kailee Kline, owner of Health Winds, to develop a spa treatment to complement the home-kit products.

Health Winds literature says that while there is no cure for cellulite, it can be reduced and managed. The spa's cellulite treatment, using Natura Bel Fitocosmetics, combines a heat wrap and a hydrotherapy bath treatment. The results a client should expect are improvement with blood and lymph circulation and a reducing of fluid retention. One spa visit costs $140; a series of five treatments is $625.

According to Natura Bel Fitocosmetics' brochure, cellulite is a result of hypertrophy of the fat tissue and accumulation of extra cells, liquid toxins and fats in the adipocyte vacuoles affecting women's thighs, belly, knees and arms. Natura Bel Fitocosmetics suggests a regular, day-to-day treatment of the affected areas, using its five-product, take-home kit.

Wells highly recommends having a spa treatment before using the products at home, as the spa's therapist will take the time to explain the proper application of the home-care kit.

The home-care products include ivy oil, with ivy leaf and marigold extracts, which, when massaged into the skin morning and night, improve micro-circulation and lipolysis. An ivy gel, made also from ivy leaf extracts, is said to improve circulation when rubbed into the skin after a shower. In the evening, use the ivy oil, then follow up with a bath with a capful of juniper bath (juniper and lavender essential oils) or juniper salts (minerals and essential oils of juniper and lavender), which claim to increase the elimination of toxins. Then apply the ivy gel. Once a week, use of the Laminaria Body Mask is recommended. Containing extracts of brown seaweed, horsetail, ivy, chestnut, guarana and juniper essential oils, it gives an extra boost to your anti-cellulite regime.

To book an appointment for a cellulite treatment or to purchase Natura Bel Fitocosmetics, call Health Winds at 416-488-9545.

Yoga offers an array of health benefits

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Helen Goldstein, director and founder of the Yoga Studio, knows all about the healing and the restorative powers of yoga.

In the 1980s and early '90s, she was a highly successful real estate agent and a confirmed workaholic who was constantly on the run.

"I worked 60 hours a week," Goldstein recalled. "I lived on 10 cups of coffee a day. I ate a sandwich in the car and I got my energy from chocolate bars."

But her body could not endure the stress indefinitely. After she was diagnosed with hepatitis in 1986, Goldstein rediscovered yoga. In 1995, she left real estate to open the Yoga Studio.

Yoga is an ancient discipline that combines stretching, deep breathing and relaxation. In hatha yoga, the classic approach, the body is configured in various postures or asanas, as they are called, which stretch different muscles of the body to improve flexibility and strength, Goldstein explained.

"The many different types of yoga range from very sedentary to very aerobic. The aerobic-type yoga, one of which is known as 'power yoga' or ashtanga, is relatively new and geared to North America."

The postures massage the various organ systems, increasing energy and relieving physical problems caused by injury or chronic illnesses, and they are really good for the hormonal and digestive systems, she said.

Goldstein, who has since recovered from hepatitis, attributes the restoration of her health to yoga. "I was a mess... I couldn't get out of bed for six months... Yoga was a powerful force in getting my health back."

She went on to say that she offers a particular style of yoga geared to people with injuries or chronic diseases – restorative yoga. This type of yoga, which incorporates gentle, therapeutic techniques to release tightness and increase mobility and flexibility, is now also taught at several yoga centres in the city.

Goldstein said that there is a greater use of props in restorative classes than in other types of yoga classes. "We use blankets, bolsters and pillows to help people feel more comfortable in the postures."

As well, the postures and movements are gentler, she said, noting that the classes can also incorporate Kripalu yoga, a more meditative and self-reflective yoga.

Restorative yoga is good for fibromyalgia, neck, shoulder, hip and back problems, Goldstein said. "There are clinical studies that say restorative yoga is the best treatment for fibromyalgia."

Indeed, she recounted how a former student came to the studio barely able to walk because of fibromyalgic pain. "She started in the restorative yoga class and within two years she was backpacking though India. When she came back, she became a yoga teacher."

Goldstein said that restorative yoga is also beneficial for cancer. "A number of our teachers teach classes at Wellspring, a centre for cancer patients and their families."

She added that restorative yoga definitely heals sports injuries.

Former Blue Jay star Carlos Delgado and National Hockey League star Eric Lindros are among several well-known athletes who have come to the Yoga Studio for private restorative yoga classes, she said.

"They're young guys coming because of injuries and they're using the restorative powers of yoga to improve their game and to avoid more injuries."

Goldstein said all forms of yoga offer a considerable array of benefits, especially in the area of preventative health. "Yoga creates a very strong back. It's really good for osteoporosis. Your spine twists. When your spine twists, it creates flexibility in your body and it strengthens the central nervous system."

Yoga also helps specific organs like the liver and kidneys release toxins, she added. "Certain postures squeeze the vital organs and they cleanse the toxins and strengthen the organs."

The relaxation response, which is what happens during meditation, can prevent cancer and heart problems, she said.

"Dr. Dean Ornish, a well-known American cardiologist, found very definite proof that diet, yoga, meditation and hugs can prevent and reverse heart disease. His patients have shown an astounding recovery rate."

She stressed that yoga and eating healthy go hand in hand.

"One of the things that is a natural byproduct of yoga is that you are more aware of your body and sensitive about what you put into it," she said.

The Yoga Studio offers 14 different types of yoga styles, as well as Pilates and mediation, Goldstein said. "Sometimes you want something challenging and aerobic and sometimes you want something more meditative and restorative."

'Soldier of science' found a cure for pellagra

Goldberger's War by Alan Kraut, Hill & Wang.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The American master epidemiologist Joseph Goldberger is not exactly a household name in medical circles today, but he ought to be. His contribution to public health in the United States was nothing less than stellar.

Alan Kraut

Until he came along, pellagra was an incurable disease that plagued legions of Americans in the early 20th century.

Known as "the scourge of the South," pellagra was a mystery disease that defied physicians. No one knew what caused it, how it spread or how to find a cure.

First identified in early 18th-century Spain, pellagra began with a hideous rash and was followed by a painful swelling and irritation of the hands and mouth that led to tortuous digestive disorders and insanity. It culminated in death in about 30 per cent of the cases, and doctors were powerless to deal with it.

Pellagra, which was prevalent in various parts of Europe, the Middle East, Africa and Asia, came to the attention of U.S. public health officials in the early 20th century, at a time when epidemic diseases such as smallpox and cholera were on the wane.

Goldberger, a member of the U.S. Public Health Service who had battled yellow fever and typhus in Mexico, hypothesized that pellagra was caused by a nutritional deficiency rather than air-borne germs.

But Goldberger's thesis ran into resistance, and as a result, he had to resort to unorthodox methods to prove his critics wrong.

The story of Goldberger's heroic efforts to eradicate pellagra is the subject of a first-rate biography by Alan Kraut, Goldberger's War. Kraut, a professor of history at American University, sheds light on his discovery through an exploration of medical and Southern history.

Like many trailblazers in America, Goldberger was an immigrant. Born in the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1874, he arrived in New York City with his family when he was just a boy. Raised in the tenements of the fabled Lower East Side, he graduated from Bellevue Hospital Medical College in 1892.

By then, as Kraut points out, the pattern of discrimination against Jewish applicants was not yet firmly in place.

Joining the U.S. Public Health Service as an assistant surgeon, Goldberger first honed his skills in Manhattan where he was required to examine newly arrived immigrants.

In 1900, he was assigned to a quarantine station in Delaware that inspected ships seeking entry to the port of Philadelphia.

It was there that he met a man who was to become a lifelong friend, Thomas Farrar Richardson. He introduced him to his cousin, Mary, Goldberger's wife-to-be and collaborator in the struggle against pellagra.

Reassigned yet again, but to a posting abroad, he and Mary went to Tampico, Mexico. Attached to the U.S. consulate, Goldberger's task was to inspect cargoes bound for the United States. Contracting yellow fever, he treated himself as he charted the progress of his illness.

In 1914, he was asked to take over a pellagra study from a colleague, who described it as "one of the knottiest and most urgent problems" facing the country.

Breaking with conventional wisdom, Goldberger concluded that pellagra was triggered by a flawed diet and not a pathogen, and was essentially a function of poverty.

Prescribing a change in diet, he urged sufferers to forego cornmeal, grits, fatback and molasses in favour of lean red meat, fresh vegetables, eggs and milk. Goldberger noted that pellagra did not affect people on a well-balanced, varied food regimen.

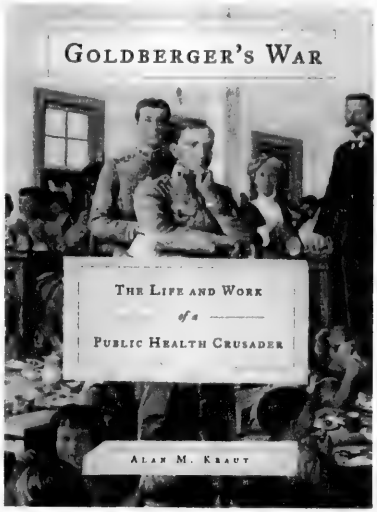
He urged tenant farmers and sharecroppers, often the victims of pellagra, to cultivate cowpeas, or black-eyed peas, to supplement their normally poor diets.

Goldberger, however, needed to conduct controlled trials to prove his theory beyond a reasonable doubt.

Detractors claimed, for example, that he had not eliminated the possibility that well-nourished individuals could contract pellagra. Taking up their challenge, Goldberger turned to convict volunteers at Rankin State Prison Farm in Mississippi to silence the critics.

Concentrating on the meals they were served day in and day out, he observed that breakfast usually consisted of biscuits, fried mush, grits, brown gravy, cane syrup and sugared coffee, lunch was made up of corn bread, collards, sweet potatoes, grits and syrup, while supper was a combination of the above two.

Many southerners of modest means, including cotton mill workers, were reduced to virtually the same diet.



Like beriberi and scurvy, pellagra was caused by a nutritional deficiency and not an errant microbe, Goldberger theorized.

He continued his path-breaking study at the U.S. Pellagra Hospital in Spartanburg, S.C., only this time his devoted wife was one of his guinea pigs.

He injected her with seven cubic centimetres of blood taken from three pellagrins. "This was an act of faith," she said years later. His aim was to disabuse skeptics of the notion that pellagra was an infectious disease.

Goldberger was also a volunteer. He not only took the blood of pellagrins but ingested their scabs and excreta. What a brave man!

Much to his delight, none of the volunteers developed pellagra. He wrote: "These experiments furnish no support for the view that pellagra is a commnunicable disease; they materially strengthen the conclusion that it is a disease of dietary origin, brought about by a faulty, probably 'deficient' diet."

He presented his findings to the Southern Medical Association in Atlanta on Nov. 16, 1916, little more than a year after Leo Frank, a Northern Jewish businessman, was lynched by an anti-Semitic white mob in Georgia after being accused of murdering a teenaged girl.

Goldberger, who wiped out a dreaded disease and saved the lives of literally thousands of southerners, died on Jan. 18, 1929, in Washington, D.C.

Southerners mourned his passing, as did the media. Typical of the praise, the Daily Clarion-Ledger in Jackson, Miss., said of him, "Civilization owes a debt of gratitude to this soldier of science who attacked and conquered an unknown enemy."

He was indeed a hero, inspring appreciation from peers, two films and a comic book. And thanks to Goldberger's War, a new generation of North Americans can now become acquainted with him.

Sol, Garfinkel read at Jewish poetry night

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Touted as "a night for bubbies, mensches and Jew-lovers everywhere," the first-ever Jewish poetry night will be presented under the auspices of Suburban Spoken Word – a monthly poetry gathering north of Toronto.

Poets Adam Sol and Jonathan Garfinkel will be featured at the March 20 reading at Queen of Hearts Pub. Both are published authors whose Jewish-themed writings have been acclaimed.

David Silverberg, the host of Spoken Word, is a 26-year-old freelance writer and poet who began the successful poetry readings three years ago.

"I've noticed more poets e-mailing me to request to be a feature, and that's a sign that word-of-mouth is spreading quickly," says Silverberg, who adds that he "couldn't wait to create a Jewish poetry night." It was just a question of finding the right poets.

When Silverberg ran into Sol and Garfinkel at other readings, he says he knew the timing was right to create an evening of Jewish poetry.

Sol has been giving readings for more than 10 years, and has two published books of poetry to his credit, Crowd of Sounds (House of Anansi) and Jonah's Promise (MidList Press).

Sol has written that he wants to write poems "that deal with Jewish subjects from the inside – not as an alienated witness, but as a participant – and to explore the inherent difficulties of allying oneself with any community, religious or otherwise."

Sol has been writing poetry since high school, but began to take it seriously when he had the American Pulitzer Prize-winning poet Philip Levine as a teacher as an undergraduate at Tufts University. He then earned an MFA in creative writing at Indiana University, which he says also made a difference to his creative muse. He finished his PhD at the University of Cincinnati and now teaches at York University in Toronto and at the University of Toronto, Scarborough campus.

Garfinkel's poetry has appeared in various publications. His first book of poems, Glass Psalms, will be published in April by Turnstone Press. His poems include odes to his travels in eastern Europe and the Middle East – including Israel, Egypt and the West Bank. He has read at Ashkenaz: A Festival of New Yiddish Culture, the Jewish Book Fair, and University of British Columbia.

No stranger to Jewish-themed writing, one of his poems, The Shoichet Room, is about his experience sleeping in the shoichet's bedroom in the Twarda Street synagogue in Warsaw, Poland. His play, The Trials of John Demjanjuk: A Holocaust Cabaret, will be published this summer.

Garfinkel, who has been writing poetry since elementary school, says he is looking forward to reading with Sol at the Queen of Hearts. Sol is a friend of his and helped him edit Glass Psalms over the past four years.

Of Sol's poetic influence, Garfinkel says, "He has pushed me to keep editing, keep writing, to make things better and always look for the edge, the inventive, and to get rid of the cliché, and pay attention to every word."

For those who aren't acquainted with the poetry scene, or who perhaps expect to meet beret-wearing, latté-swilling artistes snapping their fingers in appreciation, don't fret. No one with such faux beatnik airs has yet attended Suburban Spoken Word. They come, barely drinking age or barely divorced, verse novice or verse veteran, to be entertained by words and the wordsmiths.

In true suburban style, Spoken Word takes place in a bridge-room-cum-poetry-café. It usually attracts an audience of about 40 people, many of whom are neophytes to performance poetry.

They seat themselves classroom-style, facing the dais, listening as a cross-section of poets strut their stuff.

The audience can participate in open mike sessions, during which anyone is allowed to step onto the stage. Those brave enough to come forward are awarded prizes – books, appropriately enough.

Guests of Suburban Spoken Word have included many renowned poets, among them Wakefield Brewster. Known as "The Lyrical Pitbull," Brewster, who has an aggressive delivery style, has performed in New York, Los Angeles and across Canada. Jewish poets who have read at Spoken Word include Barbara Adler, Elyse Friedman, Stuart Ross, Noah Leznoff, Jacob Sheier and Mike Drach.

Jewish poetry night takes place at the Queen of Hearts Pub, 390 Steeles Ave. W, Thornhill, 8 p.m., on March 20. Cover is $5. For more information, visit www.suburbanspokenword.com

Career of photographer Andre Kertesz minutely examined in coffee-table book

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Andre Kertesz (1894-1985) was one of the most influential photographers of the 20th century, fixated with recording the complex web of modern city life.

Kertesz, who thought he was born to be a photographer, left a valuable portfolio of stunning black-and-white photographs of Paris of the 1920s and 1930s and New York City of the late 1930s to the mid-1980s.

In Andre Kertesz (Princeton University Press), he is memorialized in a bright coffee-table book brimming with stark, strong photographs of cityscapes and people.

The editors are Sarah Greenough, curator and head of the department of photographs at the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C.; Robert Gurbo, curator of The Andre and Elizabeth Kertesz Foundation in New York, and Sarah Kennel, an assistant curator at the National Gallery of Art.

Kertesz, a Hungarian Jew, was born in Budapest, the son of a bookseller and a coffee shop attendant. A few days before his final high school examinations, his mother bought him and his brother a camera.

Drafted into the Austro-Hungarian army in 1914, Kertesz always carried a camera in his knapsack. His pictures of raw recruits and towns he visited are evocative.

Wounded in 1915, he spent much of 1916 convalescing. In 1917, a Budapest weekly published his first photograph. Concluding that photography could not sustain him, he turned to beekeeping. But soon, he returned to photography, displaying his work at exhibits.

Not satisfied with his progress, he settled in Paris. His timing was fortuitous. The European illustrated press had an unquenchable thirst for new talent. Nevertheless, he also worked as a retoucher and developer to make ends meet.

Galvanized by a job offer from the Keystone Press Agency in New York, he settled in the United States in 1936. On the side, he freelanced for such magazines as Collier's, Harper's Bazaar and Vogue and exhibited widely.

He was not entirely happy in New York, which lacked that sense of community he had become accustomed to in Paris. But as the editors suggest, Kertesz believed American critics short-changed him.

During the 1960s and 1970s, he found a niche as collectors clamoured for vintage prints and institutions sought him out as a guest lecturer.

Toward the close of his career, Kertesz was an internationally renowned photographer.

Andre Kertesz, a book of 250 photographs, erudite essays and revealing excerpts from the photographer's previously unpublished diaries and correspondence, distills the essence of his career as an exceptionally talented artist.

NEW EXHIBIT SHOWCASES 'TRIUMPHS AND TREASURES' FROM VAST YIVO COLLECTIONS

An upcoming exhibit at the YIVO Institute for Research in New York showcases hundreds of rare and select items from its huge archival collection of 23 million items and 360,000 volumes.

YIVO at 80: Triumphs and Treasures spans centuries of East European and American Jewish history.

Still, the wide-ranging exhibit "is not a cohesive story of Jewish life," said curator-archivist Krysia Fisher. "Rather, we are making the public aware of the breadth and depth of YIVO's holdings and of the priceless resource these materials represent to the Jewish people."

One of the rarest items is the book Hatsa'ah 'al odot haget (An Account of the Bill of Divorce Given by Samuel Vintoroso), published in Venice in 1566. It relates the story of a woman who was jilted by her betrothed, whose father urged the Venetian rabbinate to excommunicate the reluctant bridegroom.

Other items include a fancy 18th-century talmudic tractate, a 19th-century photo of Warsaw cantor Moishe Koussevitzky, a 1916 photo of Jewish immigrants waving American flags outside the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society on East Broadway, letters to Jewish leaders from Theodore Roosevelt and Herbert Hoover, and a pennant from the 1936 Convention of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union.

The show opens at the Center for Jewish History, Manhattan, on April 6.

Names in the News: Winnipeg author-historian Allan Levine, who alternates between writing engaging historical works and murder mysteries set in early-1900s Winnipeg, has produced a new non-fiction work, The Devil in Babylon: Fear of Progress and the Birth of Modern Life. Levine's eighth book examines North American culture and a host of moral and ethical issues from about 1900 to 1930. Toronto-based McClelland and Stewart plans to publish it in April.

Montreal-based photographer Lynne Cohen is one of eight recipients of a Governor General's Award in visual and media arts this week. The Wisconsin-born Cohen, who lived in Ottawa for many years, has had countless solo and group exhibitions around the world and is represented in 47 public collections, including the National Gallery of Canada. The awards ceremony is Wednesday, March 16 at Rideau Hall in Ottawa.

Steve Coll, associate editor of The Washington Post, has won the 15th annual Lionel Gelber Prize for the world's best book on foreign policy writing in 2004. Coll's book is Ghost Wars: The Secret History of the CIA, Afghanistan and Bin Laden, From the Soviet Invasion to September 10, 2001 (Penguin). He gives a public lecture and picks up the $15,000 award at the University of Toronto's Munk Centre on March 30. Established by Canadian diplomat Lionel Gelber, the prize has been called "the world's most important award for non-fiction."

TRAVEL TO ISRAEL ON A ROMANTIC TRIP WHILE YOUR KIDS ARE IN CAMP

Downfall portrays the last 10 days of Hitler's life

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Oliver Hirschbiegel's remarkable feature film about Adolf Hitler's last 10 days on this planet, Downfall, paints a chilling picture of the Nazi dictator.

Hirschbiegel resists the temptation to present Hitler as a cartoon character. Yes, he was a demon and a disgrace to Germany. Yet Hitler was a complex figure on a basic human level.

Downfall, which opens March 18, is based on historian Joachim Fest's book and the memoirs of Hitler's secretary, Traudl Junge.

Much of the action in Downfall, an Academy Award nominee for best foreign movie this year, takes place in a bunker in Berlin besieged by the advancing Red Army.

Hitler's closest colleagues, including Hermann Goering and Joseph Goebbels, as well as his fiance, Eva Braun, have chosen to be with him in this dank, claustrophobic space.

Outside, on the streets of Berlin, chaos prevails. Allied aircraft bomb the shattered city and officials throw top-secret documents out of windows, consigning them to fiery pyres. Hirschbiegel evokes this end-of-days atmosphere with astonishing veracity.

Hitler is virtually in every frame, and the Swiss actor who portrays him, Bruno Ganz, is brilliant in aping his physical features, body language and voice.

As he emerges in this movie, Hitler is mercurial, his moods in constant flux.

He greets secretaries with a smile, and shows solicitude and understanding when Junge cannot keep up with his rapid-fire dictation. And Hitler lovingly plants a kiss on his beloved dog, Blondie. It's clear that Hitler has feelings for those he values.

His cruel, inhuman side crops up when minions urge him to leave the bunker and evacuate Berlin's civilians.

Hitler will have none of that. He is delusionally convinced, at least at the outset, that the war can be won. As far as civilian casualties are concerned, he could not care less about their fate. "In a war like this there are no civilians," he rages, shortly after inspecting a model of futuristic Berlin by his favourite architect Albert Speer.

Vivid battle scenes light up the screen as Hitler plots tactics with his harried generals. He misinterprets their caution as treason and dismisses them as traitorous scum. But after one of his standard tirades, he acknowledges that the end is at hand. "It's over. The war is lost."

Hitler's closest confidants have a better appreciation of realities on the ground. Goering, whom Hitler crudely describes as a "morphine addict," thinks Germany should negotiate a last-minute deal with the United States to stave off a dreaded Russian occupation. Heinrich Himmler, the ultimate Nazi loyalist, proposes a similar strategy.

Hirschbiegel excels at portraying the surreal dramas that unfold in the bunker. As bombs rain down on them, Braun and her friends keep reality at bay by partying. As Russian tanks clank ever closer, Goebbels' angelic children seranade the fuhrer with an escapist song. And off in another room, a Roman orgy ensues.

Bruno Ganz, right, as Hitler with Juliane Kohler as Eva Braun.

In what is probably the film's most gripping moment, Goebbels and his steely wife, Magda, poison their children before committing suicide themselves. Their rationale: better to die than live under the boot of the Allies.

There are three references to Jews and/or the Holocaust in the film.

Hitler defames Jews as "pigs." He calls the ethnic cleansing of Jews from Germany his greatest achievement. Bent and palsied, he dictates his last testament, blaming "international Jewry and its supporters" for Germany's looming defeat.

As Downfall heads toward its climax, so-called traitors are ruthlessly and unceremoniously shot, and in the bunker, officials prepare to incinerate the bodies of Hitler and Braun, who have committed suicide.

This taut film pulls no punches as it chronicles a tyrant's final hours and a monstrous regime's death throes. It is recommended to viewers interested in an unusually dark period of history that brought Europe pain and suffering and Jews unimagined persecution and destruction.

Rosenstrasse based on true story

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

A number of important Jewish films have been released on video and DVD recently. I haven't had a chance to report on them until now, but I will attempt to catch up a little with this piece.

One of the most popular films from last year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival arrived on home video in January. Rosenstrasse is a compelling film about a group of German women who stood up to the Nazis and protested in public against the arrest of their Jewish husbands.

The film is based on a true incident. These Jewish men lived securely in Berlin for many years and it was only in 1943 that the Nazis finally decided to round them up and deport them to the death camps in the east.

Their German wives refused to allow this to happen. They gathered in the street in front of the building where their men were being held and refused to leave until their husbands were released.

The film tells the story in a series of flashbacks as one young Jewish woman from New York travels to Germany to try to unravel the mystery of her mother's experiences during the war.

This is a powerful film about love, devotion and heroism that is seen only rarely in real life, and it is about an event that has received very little publicity until recently.

Shanghai Ghetto is another excellent film that was screened by the Toronto Jewish Festival a few years ago. It is a documentary about the little known story of the sanctuary thousands of European Jews found in Japanese occupied Shanghai, China during the Holocaust.

Narrated by American film actor Martin Landau, the film uses archival footage to tell the story of how these desperate refugees made their way to faraway China. Shut out of most countries in the world, Jews fleeing for their lives could find only a handful of places that would accept them, and Shanghai was one of those places.

In order to make this documentary, filmmakers Dana Janklowicz-Mann and Amir Mann sneaked into China with two survivors and took pictures at the site of the original Shanghai Ghetto. Combined with interviews of survivors, stock footage, still photos and other rare material, the filmmakers stitched together the complete story and produced a film that is totally fascinating and absorbing.

And finally, we have Edges of the Lord, a film that tells the story of a young Jewish boy who was hidden out in the Polish countryside during the Holocaust.

The boy was taken in by a farmer who lived in a small village. The boy pretended to be the farmer's nephew and was coached in the ways of Catholicism by the local parish priest.

The film features Haley Joel Osment and Willem Dafoe and would have been a truly moving film if the filmmakers hadn't decided that the lead actors use fake European accents.

In many ways, this destroys much of the credibility of the film.

All three films should be available at better video stores everywhere. If not, the stores can order them from their local distributor.
